Perhaps the writer may be accused of egotism for placing at the head of this article the title which Victor Hugo immortalized in his description of the events which took place during the overthrow of popular government in France, but a careful reading of what is taking place in so-called "Free America," as set forth below, will not only excuse the writer, but justify him, although this writing were entitled the "Crime of a Century."

On the 15th of November, 1901, the so-called "rural free delivery" was, by the aid of 14 inspectors, instituted throughout Niagara County, thereby doing away with three post-offices between Lockport and Ransomville. The North Ridge office, one of those discontinued, was situated nearly 10 miles from Lockport and about 4 miles from Ransomville. This was my office of address.

On the 14th of November, 1901, I erected a box for the reception of mail, and received mail in such box till January 24, 1902. Both carriers, regular and alternate, have stated that the box provided is convenient and satisfactory to them. In the meantime, to determine whether the box which satisfied the parties in interest would be acceptable to the postal authorities, the Department was appealed to, and a curt reply was received, saying that unless some other safe and weatherproof box was erected or contracted for prior to May 1, 1901—the patrons of the rural free delivery were required to erect a box from a list of 14 on an inclosed card—or after thirty days' notice, their mail service would be withdrawn.

Believing such action arbitrary, unlawful, and unjust, I sent an article to the Niagara Sun, of Lockport, asking that the law in relation to the matter be published. The reply to this request (see Niagara Sun of January 7, 1902) was in effect that it was "by direction of the Postmaster-General," and no law on which such "direction" was founded was quoted, although the power to prescribe regulations is distinctly limited by law. (See Postal Laws and Regulations, page 10.)

I received notice December 23, 1901, to purchase one of the 14 boxes, or my service would be withdrawn. Firmly believing that through some mistake the people's rights being invaded, I wrote to the Postmaster-General asking for the act of Congress and the departmental regulations in regard to the subject. The reply contained rules and regulations concerning the institution of rural free-delivery routes, and also a blank petition, to be signed by heads of families who desired the service, by which the signers agree "to erect for the reception of our mail boxes which have been approved by the Department." In the Ohio Farmer of January 13, 1902, may be found a statement of Mr. Machen, the superintendent of free delivery, which says, "Rural delivery is in every case established upon petition of the people." Please remember this point.

On the 24th of January, 1902, I received no mail; on the following day I served a notice on the carrier directing him to receive my mail from the postmaster and deposit it in the box erected by me, and releasing him from all further liability after such deposit, except in regard to registered matter. On the same day I caused a notice to be served on the postmaster in Lockport directing him to deliver mail addressed to me to the proper carrier, and exonerating him from all further liability after such action.

No attention was paid to my request for delivery, and I went to Lockport on February 11, 1902, and after presenting my information to the proper United States authority, was told that time would be required in such a serious case, for consultation with higher authority, but that the postmaster would be seen, and that I should receive a letter in regard to the matter on the following Tuesday. On Monday, February 10, 1902, a letter addressed to me was advertised (see Niagara County Journal of February 14), and on Saturday, February 15, I received a special delivery letter by the mail carrier.

On Tuesday, the day specified, I did not receive the promised letter, and on the following day, February 19, I went to Lockport, and was told that the authorities, on my sworn information, would grant me no redress.

Under the advice of the best legal talent in Lockport I consulted eminent authority in Buffalo, and was informed, practically, that "on the oppressor's side was power," although the ruling under which the Department is acting was made on August 1, 1901, to take effect May 1, 1901, and Congress, which has the lawmaking power, has no right to enact an ex post facto law. The term "anarchist," it would seem from this, does not invariably attach to an ignorant, misguided individual of low foreign birth.

Let me recapitulate and refer the reader to the Postal Laws and Regulations, which before have been considered authority, but which have, alas, no bearing at present, when a new ruling, under no law, is put forth, which holds the people while monopoly plunders them.

First, in regard to discontinued offices, page 223, "Matter addressed to a discontinued office may be delivered from the nearest office thereto."

There are three offices nearer to me than the Lockport office, where my mail is detained, the Ransomville office being nearest.

Directions for delivering, page 233, "The delivery in each case should be to the person addressed, or according to his order." The order for the delivery of my mail was in the postmaster's hands.

What to be advertised, page 232, "All unclaimed matter of the first class." Was my mail matter unclaimed?

Dead matter, page 235, "Unclaimed; that which is not called for and can not be delivered." The carrier is supposed to pass my house every day.

What rights have special-delivery letters over ordinary prepaid letters except that effort must be made to deliver them speedily? In other words, if a letter is nondeliverable, will a special stamp cause its delivery?

If a postmaster sends mail by an unauthorized individual, he may be punished. Should he not be held to a stricter account for refusing mail to a person armed with the proper authority to receive such mail?

The Department, in forcing people to deal with certain manufacturers, is exercising a power never delegated to the General Government by the State of New York or the people.

Diligent inquiry establishes the fact that no petition was ever signed or circulated to establish rural free delivery on route No. 1 in the county of Niagara, and there seems to be an utter lack of system and judgment in the matter. For instance, mail is delivered to one person who has no box and withheld from another in like case. One homemade box erected last fall is "all right," while another equally good is rejected.

The mail of a minister of the gospel, who has a perfectly weather-proof box, is withheld, and yet mail is delivered at the country hotel, where there is no box, and an interesting question presents itself, if a person who had been forced to buy one of the regulation boxes should have mail destroyed in said box because of the lack of the qualities supposed to be guaranteed, who would be responsible?

The vital principle at stake is this: Had the Department engaged in the manufacture of boxes and sold them at a certain fixed price, the same as postage stamps are sold, the Government receiving the increment, no particular objection could have been made; but when the Department enters into active partnership with private concerns the people can hardly fail to believe that they are being exploited for private benefit. The appearance of evil should be avoided, and a semblance of equal rights be made to appear by compelling the people of the different cities to purchase and erect boxes manufactured by the beloved 14 firms.

There is no doubt that after the peasants have been subdued the conquest of the burghers will be attempted; but perhaps the Department is wise not to create too much discontent even in this monopoly-ridden but long-suffering land. To those who believe in the ultimate triumph of truth and justice, there is hope even in defeat, and there are sometimes victories which end in shame and humiliation. Let us remember that—

"'Tis better to have fought and lost
Than never to have fought at all."

And also—

"For freedom's battle, once begun, Though baffled off, is ever won."

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1902.

SIR: Complaint has come to me in regard to the action of the postal authorities in requiring farmers and others along rural free-delivery routes to buy a certain type or style of box in which mail will be deposited. This is a very heavy expense, involving millions of dollars, and if the Post-Office Department has authority to make the requirement, I would be glad for you to point me to the section in the law which authorizes it. Also inform me whether there is any such regulation in force, because those who have boxes to sell may be acting of their own volition.

A prompt reply with full information will very much oblige me, as I do not care to do the Department an injustice or to agitate the matter in the Senate without full information.

Please return the card I sent you.

Yours, truly,

Hon. WM. M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

B. R. TILLMAN.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 5, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: Owing to absence from the city for a few days I have not had an earlier opportunity of answering your letter of January 29 relative to rural free-delivery boxes.

In reply thereto I beg leave to say that the regulation requiring persons who desire to have their mail delivered to use one of the boxes specified by the Department was found to be necessary in order to secure the most efficient service. One of the questions which received serious consideration in the preliminary stages of rural free delivery was the character of the boxes which should be required to be put up by the patrons of the service. Previous to any requirement, all kinds of boxes, some of them of the crudest and most flimsy character, were used for the purpose, in which the mail deposited was utterly insecure and which were subject to wanton or malicious molestation. In order to throw some kind of protection over these boxes, the Department held that rural boxes could be included under the provisions of section 5483, United States Revised Statutes, which provides penalties for "any person who shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail matter deposited in any letter box, pillar box, or other receptacle established by authority of the Postmaster-General."

In order to insure this protection the Postmaster-General authorized the use of certain boxes which it was deemed would have the protection of the law. In making this selection notice was published inviting inventors and makers of boxes to submit the same for the consideration of the Department, and a special committee was organized for the purpose of passing on the qualities of the boxes submitted. Some 63 boxes in all were submitted. This committee rejected all such as did not seem to have the requisite qualities of security, stability, and simplicity, and selected 14 boxes, being all of those which had these qualities. These are the boxes specified on the list which you sent me (which is herewith returned), and were approved by order of the Postmaster-General something like a year ago. In order to have a certain degree of uniformity and to secure protection to the mail, it was ruled that those desiring to have the benefit of the rural delivery must secure one of those boxes, which must be placed along the road so that it can be reached by the carrier without dismounting. Of course any person who does not feel that he ought to procure a box may have his mail retained at the post-office and may call for it as heretofore, but to enjoy the benefits of the rural service he is compelled to comply with this requirement.

As to the authority of the Postmaster-General to make the order in question, in addition to the law quoted above, I think it may be fully sustained by the act of Congress appropriating money for the rural service by which the Postmaster-General was entrusted with all the details of building up and managing the system. Congress confided to the discretion of the Department the determination of the means by which this delivery should be inaugurated and carried on. The language in which the appropriation was made was construed to evince the wish of Congress that the Postmaster-General should use the widest discretion in the choice of agents and methods in testing the practicability of rural deliveries. As the conditions were entirely novel, the difficulties unknown, and the methods of administration without precedent, definite legislation was practically impossible. The renewal of the experimental appropriations for this service from year to year, without any limitation upon or direction to the Department, indicated that the Department had correctly interpreted the intent of Congress, which was to afford the widest scope for testing the feasibility and value of the service and develop the best methods for its initiation and management. The actual legislation on the subject is very meager, but through departmental rules and regulations we have built up an administrative system by which the rural-delivery service has been successfully established.

The Department has no wish to impose any undue burden upon the people and is of the opinion that nothing unreasonable has been asked in the way of requiring boxes.

Trusting that this explanation will be satisfactory, I remain, with very great respect,

Yours, sincerely,

W. M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SENATE,

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of February 5. There is one point I beg to suggest for your consideration and answer, to wit: You say in order to have a certain degree of uniformity and to secure protection to the mail it was ruled that those desiring to have the benefit of the rural delivery must secure one of these boxes which must be placed along the road so it can be reached by the carrier without dismounting. Of course any person who does not feel that he ought to procure a box may have his mail retained at the post-office, and may call for it as heretofore, but to enjoy the benefits of the rural service he is compelled to comply with this requirement.

Now, then, where post-offices have been discontinued, as they have in many instances, rural free delivery being considered a sufficient substitute, how can persons unable or unwilling to supply these boxes obtain their mail? Must they go to the office where the rural free-delivery route starts, possibly 10 miles away?

Your answer to this as promptly as you have the other will oblige.

Yours, respectfully,

B. R. TILLMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 10, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of February 6; also, in reference to the rural-delivery boxes.

It is true, as you say, that where a local post-office has been discontinued there may be instances where a person not availing himself of the rural free-delivery service would have to go to a more distant post-office than that to which he was accustomed to go before the rural service was established. This would seem to be one of the unavoidable incidents of the service and a case where the general welfare must be considered in preference to individual cases. If, however, you have in mind a specific instance of a person unable to procure one of the designated boxes and you think an exception should be made, I should be glad to consider it and would thank you to give me particulars with a view to having the requirement waived in his case.

Very respectfully,

W. M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1902.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of February 10 received. You seem to misconceive my purpose in beginning this correspondence. Familiar as I am with farm life and with rural conditions, even in the North, and the complaint having come to me from a New York farmer, I have written for the purpose of directing your attention to an abuse, and a very great abuse. That is, the requirement of the Post-Office Department that some one of a selected list of letter boxes must be bought in order for a man to get his mail along a rural free-delivery route.

If an individual sees fit to risk his letters and papers in an ordinary, secure box, whose business is it? Certainly not yours, and under the requirements which you have promulgated hundreds of thousands of poor men are forced to pay tribute to some of the companies who have secured the privilege of the Post-Office Department for their letter boxes. This is a much greater wrong than you at first might deem possible, and I would be glad that such regulation might be promulgated as would make it unnecessary for me to attack the system in the Senate, and secure legislation, if possible, to prevent it.

I am not interested in any individual, but I am opposed to the whole scheme or ruling in regard to the matter.

Yours, etc.,

B. R. TILLMAN.

Hon. WILLIAM M. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 21, 1902.

DEAR SIR: I regret that my letter of the 10th instant should not have made clear to you the position of the Department on the question of providing secure and appropriate roadside boxes for the collection and delivery of United States mails by the rural free-delivery system. I regret still more that you should think the Post-Office Department has permitted a great wrong to be inflicted upon the farmers of the country in connection with the rural free-delivery service.

This is not a new question. It has been carefully considered by the Department for several years with a desire to protect the interests of the rural free delivery. The primary question which the Department had to consider was the safe delivery and collection of the United States mails and their protection, while being handled on rural routes, from mischievous or malicious molestation. In the earlier days of the service it was frequently reported to the United States authorities that rural free-delivery boxes were shot into, torn down, and otherwise disturbed, and their contents destroyed, and though the instigators of these outrages could sometimes be traced, the United States district attorneys were unable to bring them to prosecution and punishment.

In the annual report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, it was stated that the question of the inviolability of the mail boxes placed upon the rural free-delivery routes was one that had commanded the earnest attention of the Department. It was suggested that it would be good policy for the Government to adopt, after advertising for proposals, some uniform style of box for the rural free-delivery service, to be rented to the patrons of the delivery at some moderate price which would yield the Government reasonable interest on its investment and provide a fund for the proper care and maintenance of the boxes. It was pointed out that the Government now supplied furniture to post-offices in towns and cities and charged rental for the use of boxes, ranging from 15 cents to 50 cents a quarter for call boxes, and from 25 cents to $4 a quarter for lock boxes, and that a similar plan could well be adopted in the rural service.

In support of this proposition it was urged that grave questions had been raised whether mails placed in the ordinary rural letter boxes for collection or delivery fell within the provisions of sections 1423 and 1424 of Postal Laws and Regulations, providing penalties for malicious injuries to letter boxes or destruction of mail matter deposited therein. It was urged that all uncertainty on these points would be removed if the boxes were provided by the Government. Each would then be a miniature post-office, and persons guilty of malicious molestation or theft would clearly be amenable to the penalties prescribed by the laws of the United States.

No action being taken by the Congress on the recommendation at that session, it was specifically renewed and emphasized in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900. Stress was laid upon the embarrassment which the designation of boxes suitable for rural free delivery imposed upon the officers of the rural free-delivery service in the absence of any distinct and controlling provision of law, and, in view of the rapid development of the rural-delivery system, Congress was again asked to give authority for the selection of a rural box to be purchased and maintained by the United States, and to be leased to the patrons of rural free delivery at a trifling annual charge. This recommendation also failed to receive action.

In the meantime the complaints of the insecurity and unsuitability of rural boxes increased, and with over 4,000 routes in operation and more than 6,000 petitions pending and unacted upon for the extension of the service, the Department felt impelled to take action. On the 12th of January, 1901 (see report of First Assistant Postmaster-General for that fiscal year, p. 44 et seq.), the Postmaster-General appointed a commission composed of five Post-Office officials, selected from the different branches of the service, in whose judgment, discretion, and integrity the Department had full confidence, to examine all designs of rural boxes submitted to them, and to recommend such as seemed best suited for the service. Thirty days' notice of the meeting of this commission was given in the official bulletin and through the public press. All persons having designs for rural free-delivery boxes were asked to submit them for examination on or before February 15, 1901. The commission met in Washington City on the 18th of February, 1901, and remained in open session until the 5th of March, 1901, examining all models of boxes submitted, and giving public hearings to all inventors and promoters who desired to point out the merits of their respective devices.

Although the order of the Postmaster-General named the 15th of February, 1901, as the last day to receive models for examination, the commission rightly determined that it was the purpose of the Department to give the widest possible scope to the investigation, and examined all boxes submitted to them up to the day of their adjournment. Certain requirements as to material of construction, size, shape, and accessibility were determined upon, and 14 of the 63 models submitted were reported upon as being suitable for adoption in the rural free-delivery service. The manufacturers of these boxes resided in different sections of the country, and each submitted written specifications agreeing to furnish boxes of the approved model at stipulated prices, ranging from $1 up to $3.50 each, according to quality and workmanship.

On the 28th of March last the report of the commission, with the list of approved boxes, was approved by the Postmaster-General in an official order which declared that before any rural service should be hereafter established it would be necessary for the patrons to make selection from this list of approved boxes and to equip the route with them. To this order was added this significant statement:

"When a rural free-delivery route has been equipped with boxes of the above-named description, the Department will consider these boxes as falling under the protection of section 5406 of the United States Revised Statutes, which provides severe penalties for any person who shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail matter deposited in any letter box, pillar box, or other receptacle established by authority of the Postmaster-General."

The Department thus endeavored to meet the difficulty of throwing the protection of the United States statutes round the boxes used in the rural free-delivery service. I am glad to say that this plan has proved successful in operation. Since the 28th of March, when this order went into effect, 4,305 new rural routes have been established, serving, at the lowest computation, 490,500 farmers' families, each of these routes equipped with one or more of the boxes designated by the Department. The complaints received by the Department of hardship or wrong inflicted on the farmers themselves by this order have been exceedingly few in number, and, on investigation, have been generally found lacking in justice. On the other hand, innumerable letters have been received from beneficiaries of the service, stating that they would be willing to pay almost any amount rather than have it discontinued. There has been a marked decrease in reported cases of malicious destruction of mail boxes on rural routes thus equipped, and in some instances, where the perpetrators of such outrages have been discovered, the United States district attorneys have had no difficulty in bringing them to conviction and punishment.

By the vast majority of the patrons of rural free-delivery it has been deemed far less of an abuse and wrong to be compelled to pay one or two dollars for an approved metallic box, which becomes his own property and insures the protection of his mail and its delivery and collection near his doorway, than to be obliged to drive perhaps 5 miles to the country post-office and to pay 15 or 25 cents a quarter for a call box to secure his mail.

Having said this much in regard to the action of the Department in the past, I will add, for your information, that it is the intention of the Postmaster-General to order another commission to take up the rural box question again and fully consider it in all its relations to the public and the Department, with a view of recommending a method of removing all just cause of complaint, if any such exist.

Very respectfully,

W. M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, in addition to the reasons which I have already urged why Congress ought not to legislate in this bill upon the conditions existing in the Philippines, there is a further reason which has been urged before the committee. It is that this bill, in some of its provisions, is unconstitutional. I notice that when the bill was introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] he reserved the right to offer amendments if he became satisfied that any of the provisions were unconstitutional. I do not know to which particular provision he referred, but it seems to me that that portion of the bill which applies to those who have been born in the Philippines since the treaty of Paris was ratified, and those who may be born there hereafter, is clearly unconstitutional, for the reason that if a child has been born in the Philippines since that time, such child becomes an American citizen.

In support of this proposition, I beg to refer to the case of the United States v. Wong Kim Ark, in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that—

A child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who, at the time of his birth, are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicile and residence in the United States and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States by virtue of the first clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

The clause of the fourteenth amendment quoted by the court reads as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The opinion of the court in this case is very long, but after devoting a good many pages to the reasons governing its action, the court says:

Passing by questions once earnestly controverted, but finally put at rest by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, it is beyond doubt that before the enactment of the civil-rights act of 1866 or the adoption of the constitutional amendment all white persons at least, born within the sovereignty of the United States, whether children of citizens or of foreigners, excepting only children of ambassadors or public ministers of a foreign government, were native-born citizens of the United States.

Note the strong expression, "born within the sovereignty of the United States." Later on in the opinion the court say:

The foregoing considerations and authorities irresistibly lead us to these conclusions: The fourteenth amendment affirms the ancient and fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the territory, in the allegiance, and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exceptions or qualifications (as old as the rule itself) of children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on foreign ships, or of enemies within and during a hostile occupation of part of our territory, and with the single additional exception of children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. The amendment, in clear words and in manifest intent, includes the children born within the territory of the United States of all other persons, of whatever race or color, domiciled within the United States.

It is evident that the word "territory" was used in its broad sense. I refer also to the case of Loughborough v. Blake, in 5 Wheaton, where, in discussing the question as to whether Congress has authority to impose a direct tax on the District of Columbia, etc., the court says:

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States.

It then uses this language:

Does this term designate the whole or any portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania.

If that be so, it seems to follow that the recently acquired territory stands in precisely the same relation to the mainland that any other territory stands which was acquired by the United States by treaty with a foreign nation.

I wish also briefly to refer to the case of Downs v. Bidwell, a recent case in which this question has been indirectly discussed, and in which the court, after quoting the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, uses the following language:

And this court naturally held, in the slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 36), that the United States included the District and the Territories. Mr. Justice Miller observed: "It had been said by eminent judges that no man was a citizen of the United States except as he was a citizen of one of the States composing the Union. Those, therefore, who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, though within the United States, were not citizens. Whether this proposition was sound or not had never been judicially decided." And he said the question was put at rest by the amendment, and the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State was clearly recognized and established. "Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union."

It seems clear to me, therefore, every child who has been born in the Philippines since the ratification of the treaty of Paris becomes a citizen of the United States, and in so far as this measure attempts to affect his rights it is in conflict with the Constitution.

But there are other classes affected by this proposed legislation who are now residents in the Philippines. The treaty of Paris provides that:

Spanish subjects, natives of the peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such territory or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners. In case they remain in the territory they may preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by making, before a court of record, within a year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, a declaration of their decision to preserve such allegiance. In default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside.

There can be no difficulty in determining the status of that class of citizens. It is perfectly plain that unless within a year they announce their intention of retaining their Spanish citizenship they become citizens of the United States.

But there are other classes living in the Philippines whose rights have yet to be determined. The treaty, referring to one of them, says:

The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

I assume that the second class mentioned in the treaty, the native classes, includes all those in whose veins runs Chinese blood. This number, we are told, is very large, and it may become a very important element in determining what shall be done under our policy of exclusion. They are not only large in number, but they are important in their station. Governor Taft in describing them says that among them are found the most highly educated, the wealthiest, the most intelligent citizens of the island, and we know pretty well what he thinks as a matter of policy of the proposition contained in this bill to exclude them from the mainland of the United States. I beg to refer briefly to what he said upon this subject. When he was before the Committee on Immigration, I took the liberty to ask him the following question:

There is a practical question which suggests itself to me about which I should like to inquire. Under the second section of this bill—

Governor TAFT. I have never read the bill.

Senator DILLINGHAM. I will call your attention to the thought I have in mind. The second section provides:

"That from and after the passage of this act the entry into the American mainland territory of the United States of Chinese laborers coming from any of the insular possessions of the United States shall be absolutely prohibited; and this prohibition shall apply to all Chinese laborers, as well to those who were in such insular possessions at the time or times of acquisition thereof, respectively, by the United States as to those who have come there since, and it shall also apply to those who have been born there since and to those who may be born there hereafter."

But going to another section, I think it is section 52, there is this provision: "That the term 'Chinese' and the term 'Chinese person,' as used in this act, are meant to include all persons who are Chinese either by birth or descent, and as well those of mixed blood as those of the full blood, and as well females as males. And wherever herein personal pronouns are used the masculine includes the feminine."

Governor TAFT. I do not think that section ought to be passed in that shape.

The CHAIRMAN. What section is it?

The reply being given, the governor proceeds:

Governor TAFT. It would apply to a great many people in the islands who are just as pure Filipinos in their looks and characteristics as a full-blooded Indian is.

The CHAIRMAN. How would you amend that provision?

Governor TAFT. I would say—

"Provided, That the provision as to mixed bloods shall not apply to the natives of the Philippine Islands."

Further in his testimony, speaking of this class, in answer to a question as to whether many of those who were about Aginaldo were Chinese mestizos, the Governor says:

Yes, sir. Both the Spanish and the Chinese mestizos are among the ablest men in the islands. They are among the wealthiest and best educated.

Therefore, Mr. President, it appears that under this bill that very class of intelligent citizens of the Philippines, those who are doing the business of the islands, because they happen to have a taint of Chinese blood in their veins, can not, under the provisions of this bill, seek entrance to the United States.

Mr. HOAR. They could not be elected commissioners.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. As is very well suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, they might not be elected delegates or commissioners.

Mr. PENROSE. May I interrogate the Senator from Vermont on that point?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator whether that is not the law at present. There is nothing new in this bill on that point. These half-breeds can not come into the United States now, under the Geary law.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not remember what the provision is upon that subject, but if that is true it should be done away with, in my judgment.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the law as it is administered at present under the Treasury regulation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I repeat what I said yesterday; I believe this whole subject, as advised by Governor Taft in his testimony, should be relegated to the government existing in those islands, to be by it worked out in the light of the circumstances which they find existing there.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the Senator from Vermont tell me, as he is keeping tab on the decisions of the Supreme Court, what is the status of the mixed Chinese now in the Philippines, our fellow-citizens, or subjects, or colonists, or whatever they are.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will take that subject up in a few moments, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator is going to touch upon that point—

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think I will come to it very soon.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to know whether they have any rights in regard to coming to this country, to the mother country, or to the conquering country, or to the owning country, or whatever you call it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am frank to say that I not only think they have the right, but I believe they should have it. However, under the pending measure, if it becomes a law, they can not have it.

In this connection, as bearing upon the question of their status, I would refer to the recent case known as the "diamond rings case," where the court, in speaking about the ratification of the treaty of Paris, uses this language:

The treaty was ratified; Congress appropriated the money; the ratification was proclaimed. The treaty-making power, the Executive power, the legislative power concurred in the completion of the transaction.

The Philippines thereby ceased, in the language of the treaty, "to be Spanish." Ceasing to be Spanish, they ceased to be foreign country. They came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States, and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established. The result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated into the body politic, and none securing to them the right to choose their nationality. Their allegiance became due to the United States, and they became entitled to its protection.

I do not know, Mr. President, of any definition of citizenship that could be made more perfect than the phrase to which I have last called your attention. It is true—

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. In this connection, then, I should like to ask the Senator whether the provision in the bill which is pending which would seek to bar out those people would not be set aside by our Supreme Court, if it stands by the decision which he is just quoting?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I should expect so; I should hope so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would not the court stultify itself if it did not?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Well, I do not care to answer that question. I can only give my opinion, and that is a modest one. I do not claim to be a very profound constitutional lawyer.

It is true that after the time when that treaty was ratified there was a joint resolution passed this body and the House of Representatives which provided as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, vol. 32, p. 1847.)

But in the case from which I have been reading, the "Diamond-Rings case," the court refers to that resolution in this language:

But it is said that the case of the Philippines is to be distinguished from that of Porto Rico because on February 14, 1899, after the ratification of the treaty, the Senate resolved, as given in the margin—that it was not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippines into citizenship of the United States nor to permanently annex those islands.

We need not consider the force and effect of a resolution of this sort if adopted by Congress, not like that of April 20, 1898, in respect of Cuba, preliminary to the declaration of war, but after title had passed by ratified cession. It is enough that this was a joint resolution; that it was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22, not two-thirds of a quorum, and that it is absolutely without legal significance on the question before us. The meaning of the treaty can not be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it.

And more, which it is not necessary that I should read.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to state—and of course if he did so it was done inadvertently—that the McEnergy resolution passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understood it so.

Mr. VEST. No; it never passed the House. It only passed the Senate, and it was never heard of afterwards.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was led into that error, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me to explain, from the fact that it took the form of a joint resolution. I am very glad to be corrected.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just looking. I was surprised that the Senator should make the assertion. I recalled the fact the Senator from Missouri mentions. I did not recollect that it had ever passed the House, and I was looking into the statutes to find it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was led into the error in making that statement from the fact it began "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives." I am very glad to be corrected.

But in that case, Mr. President, there is a definition of citizenship which has two strong elements in it, that of allegiance on the part of the inhabitants to the United States and the corresponding element of protection on the part of the Government toward the person owing such allegiance. Can a better definition be found? It is not necessary in order to constitute citizenship that there shall be the right to vote. It is not given to women, but they have been held to be citizens; nor to minors, nor to illiterates, to paupers, and certain other classes.

But if it should finally be held that this class of persons are not citizens, even then the same duty rests upon the Government of the United States in respect of them that would rest upon the United States if they were held technically to be citizens, because they are a class of persons, adopting the language of the court, whose allegiance became due to the United States, and what else? They became entitled to the protection of the United States.

What kind of protection does that imply, Mr. President? Does it not imply the protection that is guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws, that they shall be protected in their liberty, in all of their personal rights, in the right of travel and of entry into this country? And yet, if this bill becomes a law, I do not see how one of that class coming to the port of San Francisco can, under this measure, be admitted. I sincerely hope that if the bill is to be enacted, its friends will take this matter under calm consideration and see to it that it is so amended as to do no wrong to this very important class of citizens.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would ask the Senator whether it is his contention that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are citizens of the United States?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am very strongly of the impression that certain classes of them will be so declared. I am aware that the question has not been determined.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was asking the Senator for his individual view. Does he believe that they are citizens of the United States?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think some of them are.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is indefinite.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Well, I have just discussed one class. I will discuss another class, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me call your attention to the fact that in the bill reported from the Committee on the Philippines, known as the "government bill," reported by the majority, it is declared that all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands who were there at a certain time are citizens of the Philippines, and not a word is said about being citizens of the United States.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not examined that bill, Mr. President.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator refers to the bill which has been reported from the committee?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir; it is the bill which has been reported.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not yet examined that bill. I am discussing this question at the present time in view of what may be held by the court regarding the different classes of inhabitants of the Philippine Islands with the thought that in the enactment of this bill into a law we should do no injury to the rights of any one of those classes, and with the purpose in my mind, if there are others who think as I do, to cause this provision of the bill to be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. I do not like to interrupt the Senator's very interesting argument, but in connection with the point raised by the Senator from Colorado, may I call his attention to the consideration that however the existing Filipino may be dealt with, persons hereafter born in the Philippine Islands will be likely to become citizens under the operation of the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts claim that the Philippine Islands are a part of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe that he and I concur in that view, but he is sustained in that view by only four of the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOAR. The other judges, as I understand it, do not reject that particular view. The declaration which has already been read by the Senator from Vermont of Chief Justice Marshall would seem to be as absolute a declaration on that subject as you can put into words, and the declaration in the "Diamond Rings case" also states, as the Senator from Vermont has very well said, as good a definition of citizenship as could be put into words. But they do not call them citizens. We have the declaration of Chief Justice Marshall that territory of the United States is a part of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know, but the Supreme Court set aside the decision of Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think they have done so in that particular. We have the declaration of the present Supreme Court that they have the quality which we usually consider to be a complete and perfect definition of citizenship.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say this—

Mr. HOAR. Now, then—

Mr. PATTERSON. Just one moment—

Mr. HOAR. Then you have the fourteenth amendment in addition, that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States."

Mr. PATTERSON. If the majority—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. "And of the State wherein they reside."

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut I dare say may think it does not apply to persons born in the Territories.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to suggest that the Senator from Massachusetts stands almost alone among the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber in favor of the proposition that the Constitution of the United States has anything to do with the Philippine Islands. He stands almost alone. If the other side of the Chamber will put itself upon record in favor of the proposition that the Constitution extends to the Philippine Islands, it will remove many a controversy.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. The point is not whether the Constitution of the United States extends to the Philippine Islands. The point is what are the constitutional rights of a particular individual or a thousand individuals when in the United States or when seeking to come in, and whether the person is a citizen or not.

I do not suppose the Constitution of the United States secures me trial by jury in Calcutta, and I might be tried by a United States consul and sentenced to death for an offense, or certainly in Egypt, or until very recently. But when I am here or when I present myself at the door to come home, the question whether I am a citizen of the United States is a United States domestic question. Therefore if he is a man born in the United States, he has a right to have the Constitution over him when he gets here.

The question whether he is born in the United States depends on whether Chief Justice Marshall was right when he said the Constitution includes Territories. If the Constitution does not include Territories, then there is certainly one member of this body who was born in a Territory who is not a citizen now. I do not remember who it is, but there is a Senator here who was born in one of the Territories. I have forgotten which Senator it is.

Mr. PATTERSON. I take it, Mr. President, that when a person is within the United States, and lawfully within the United States, his relation to the United States is wholly different from that of one who is without the United States and seeks to enter the United States. If he is a foreigner, he may be excluded. So far as the Filipinos are concerned, no matter what Chief Justice Marshall may have decided in the past, a judge of the highest court of this land whom all who have knowledge of the law have held in great reverence up to this time, Chief Justice Marshall has not stood in the way of the Supreme Court of the United States in reaching the decision it has reached with reference to the Philippine Islands. No man can tell in the present condition of the Supreme Court decision what the ultimate decision of that court may be with reference to the inhabitants of those islands. The probabilities are that the Supreme Court will hold that they are not citizens of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see how the Senator can say that. There is nothing to be extracted from the recent opinions of the Supreme Court except the judgment. There is no doctrine or principle to be established except so far as a majority of the court have spoken through the mouth of some judge in his opinion. In the Diamond Rings case that has happened. The majority of the court have spoken through a judge delivering the opinion, and no member of the minority has put in a doubt, if I remember aright, in regard to that doctrine. So we may take that as not only a judgment, but as a statement of the principle on which it proceeds. When you come to the other cases, the Senator is more fortunate than I am if he has discovered anything beyond the judgment as a matter on which the judges have agreed in the way of principle.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator from Vermont will bear with me for one moment, I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. HOAR. They dissented in the Diamond Rings case, I agree, from the judgment; but there was no dissent on the part of any judge from the particular statement of doctrine which they made.

Mr. PATTERSON. I imagine no one will claim the Supreme Court did not distinguish between the Territories of the United States and a simple territory appurtenant to the United States. It was for that reason that a majority of the court held that we could have one set of revenue laws for the United States, including the organized Territories of the United States, and another set of laws for the Philippine Islands; that while the islands constituted domestic territory, they were yet so foreign to the United States that they did not receive the protection of the Constitution of the United States, at least in so far as our Federal tax laws are concerned.

To-day we have in the Philippine Islands an internal-revenue law entirely and wholly distinct from the internal-revenue law we have here. The whole mass of law we are making for the Philippine Islands is upon the theory that those islands are outside the protection of the Constitution, except, as hinted in one of the decisions, that the provisions of the Constitution which relate directly to what may be termed inherent rights of the individual may in the end be held to extend over them; but when you come to the matter of citizenship, they are not citizens of the United States by any intimation which has been given by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is really not fair to the Senator from Vermont to ask him to yield, and yet I want to say that I do not think the Supreme Court has yet decided that, under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, a child born in the Philippine Islands becomes thereby a citizen of the United States. That question was certainly not before the court.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; it was not as a distinct question.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont does not claim that it was.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not claim that.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I wish to say that the friends of this measure are not going to stickle for that provision in the present bill, which relates to children born in the Philippine Islands since the date mentioned in the bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But there is still another class of residents in the Philippine Islands to whom the provisions of this bill may apply. If a native of China, we will say, who had become a Spanish subject was in the Philippines at the time when the treaty of Paris was ratified, what is his present status? We know that the Spaniards who were born on the Peninsula have the right to retain their citizenship of Spain; we know that those who choose to do otherwise, under the terms of the treaty of Paris, become citizens of the United States; but here is this other class covered by this bill who may have become citizens of Spain under the Spanish law, and the question presents itself for solution at some time whether they have not come to us with the territory that Spain ceded and whether under the general rule of international law they have not become citizens of the United States. I simply throw that out as a suggestion without again referring to the language of the court which I have already cited.

Mr. President, I did not intend to inject a discussion of the question of citizenship into this debate, but simply to call attention to the fact that there are several different classes in the Philippines upon whom one rule might operate differently, or to protect whom different rules might be required, and to suggest a reason why in this particular legislation the Philippine situation should not be disturbed, but that the whole question should be taken up by some other committee and such action taken as will be just to all classes.

It seems to me that it is unfair to the government which will probably be established in the Philippines to inject into this bill provisions governing those questions which it alone should consider, and which may prove an embarrassment in establishing such government and putting it in operation.

It appeared before the committee that the Government is already troubled, as well it may be, by the condition in which we find ourselves there. Representative HITT was present when Governor Taft was testifying, and, after asking some questions, he made this statement:

Representative HITT. The opinion of the Attorney-General is that in granting passports we can describe persons in the Philippines and Porto Rico, if we amend the law, as persons owing allegiance to the United States, and commend them, therefore, to the protection of all our officers, etc., throughout the world. That would be equivalent to the present passport, which under the law must be issued only to citizens of the United States.

It struck me curiously, when I heard that statement, that the Government should contemplate issuing something in the nature of a passport to the people of the archipelago because they owe allegiance to the United States and because the United States owes to them the protection which is their due, to afford them protection in foreign countries, and at the same time enact a law that those same persons, when they approach the port of San Francisco, shall not have the right to enter and come to the capital of their nation. I do not think there should be such a provision in this bill.

There is another suggestion made by Governor Taft which is worthy of consideration; a question which has presented itself to the Philippine Commission, a question they have been obliged to consider, and one that we shall be obliged to consider here in the United States. Governor Taft says:

Governor TAFT. There is one question which I suppose you have taken into consideration. That is the international question of excluding Chinese subjects of European governments from United States soil. That has been presented to us by consuls and others interested for other governments.

Senator DILLINGHAM. Senator Fairbanks, that is the question I suggested the other morning.

Senator LONGE. You mean the French?

Governor TAFT. Take the Chinamen who live in Hongkong, who have their homes there, and are subjects of the British King. They are British subjects. Then I suppose those in Tonquin are Chinamen and are French citizens. We had a question in relation to certain inhabitants of one of those countries over which France has jurisdiction, but who are not Chinamen. They do not wear the pigtail. They were admitted.

The question that has been presented there will undoubtedly be presented here, and this fact should be recognized.

But leaving that subject, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of the specific provisions of the bill, and, first, to a provision found at the bottom of page 27. It reads as follows:

But the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may at any time suspend the privilege of transit in any case or in all cases where the transit is sought by laborers coming from any insular territory of the United States.

When we look at another section in this bill for a definition, we find that the term "laborers" covers every person who is not an official, a teacher, a student, a merchant, a traveler for curiosity or pleasure.

The treaty of 1894 contains this clause:

It is also agreed that Chinese laborers shall continue to enjoy the privilege of transit across the territory of the United States in the course of their journey to or from other countries, subject to such regulations by the Government of the United States as may be necessary to prevent said privilege of transit from being abused.

It seems to me, therefore, that the provision of the pending measure which gives to the officers of our Government the unqualified right whenever, in their judgment, they see fit to suspend the right of transit is clearly in conflict with the provision of the treaty between the United States and the Empire of China, which only gives our Government the right to adopt regulations, etc.

It can not be said that we have the right to do this because the subjects of China may happen to be residents of territory that belongs to the United States. That makes no difference. It applies, it is true, in terms to those coming from insular territory, but if they are subjects of China, resident there, they are as much entitled to the privilege of transit through this country as though they came from Hongkong or any port of China. If, on the other hand, the man who is Chinese by birth happens to have become a citizen of the United States through residence in the islands, he may come into the United States regardless of any law which we may pass, because it would be his constitutional right to do so.

But, regardless of the question of legal construction, it seems to me that it is entirely against the policy of our Government to adopt legislation of this character. It is not only a wrong which we are perpetrating upon that class of people to whom I have before called attention, who are among the best educated, the wealthiest, and the most influential in the islands, but, as I have said, it is a direct violation of the treaty obligation existing between the respective countries.

Mr. MITCHELL. To what provision of the bill is it that the Senator has referred?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The provision at the bottom of page 27, which gives the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, full power to suspend the privilege of transit, when, under the treaty, we have only the right to regulate it. Why should we do this?

Earlier in my remarks I called attention to the very small number of those who have been deported from our country because of being here illegally. I find by examining the brief of the Assistant Attorney-General, filed in one of the pending cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, that he makes the statement that between 1883 and 1901, a period of eighteen years, there were only 37,688 applications for the privilege of transit, or an average of about 2,100 annually, and that during that time none of those were refused. In examining the figures for the last eight years I find the number applying for that privilege has decreased so that it has amounted upon an average to only about 1,490 annually.

Mr. MITCHELL. The power of suspension only applies to laborers coming from the insular possessions.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understand that; but if the Senator from Oregon will permit me, what difference does it make whether a subject of the Chinese Empire comes from China or from the Philippines?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a question for argument. I simply wished to call attention to the fact.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I understood that, if the Senator please, but my argument was that that fact made no difference.

There is another clause of this bill which seems to be against public policy and against national prosperity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say to the Senator in relation to the point to which he has just been referring—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can readily see a very wide difference between the power on the part of the Commissioner-General of Immigration to suspend the privilege of transit of persons coming from insular territory and the power to suspend the privilege of transit of persons coming from the Chinese Empire. We have the right under the treaty of Paris to legislate in regard to our own people, and it seems to me that the treaty with China does not affect this case at all.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We have the power, I admit, under the treaty of Paris to legislate in relation to natives of the Philippines and to determine their civil and political rights; but I do not see the distinction, which the Senator suggests, if the person coming from the Philippines is a subject of the Chinese Empire.

The provision to which I wish to call attention is that known as the shipping clause, which will be found on page 40 of the reprinted bill. It provides:

And it shall be unlawful for any vessel holding an American register to have or to employ in its crew any Chinese person not entitled to admission to the United States, or into the portion of the territory of the United States to which such vessel plies; and any violation of this provision shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $2,000.

Other provisions follow which it is not necessary that I should read.

From the facts which have been placed before us it appears that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which is the only American line plying between San Francisco and Hongkong, as I now remember, not only operates that foreign line, but also a line between San Francisco and Panama, using in that service seven vessels, and that upon no one of the vessels of that line is a Chinese crew employed. It appears also, both from the testimony and from the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], that Chinese crews are not employed on the line in which he is interested, which by some has been called the "good old Perkins line," operating from San Francisco to ports north of there, if I am correctly informed. That there is another line of steamships from San Francisco to Australia, and that no Chinese are employed upon that line; and I understand the reason for it is that there are no Chinese seamen who can be employed upon those lines. If they obtain them at all it must be in California, and the number of the Chinese in California has become so much reduced that those remaining there at the present time have other employment and are not looking for employment upon ships. Therefore those who employ Chinese crews are the foreign lines of steamships.

If this bill becomes a law it will operate, as the evidence tends to disclose, simply upon the three vessels that are now running between San Francisco and Hongkong, and belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and to any other vessels which they may subsequently attach to their lines.

It further appears in evidence that engaged in this foreign trade there are 60 ships between Hongkong and the Pacific coast ports; that 90 per cent of them fly the flag either of Great Britain or of Japan; that this 90 per cent employ Chinese crews in whole or in part; many of them also are benefited by subsidies granted by their governments. Therefore the operation of this bill will be to require the three American vessels which I have mentioned to enter into competition with all of this vast number of ships sailing under foreign flags which are permitted to carry Chinese crews, and the legitimate result of such legislation will be that these vessels will be driven either to go out of business or to sail under a foreign flag.

It appears that of the crews of these three vessels there are 105 white men employed and 311 Chinese; in other words, more than one-third of these crews are white men. If compelled to ship entire white crews the increase in wages alone would be $144,000 annually. In addition to these ships, there are now building at Newport News for that company two of the largest and finest ships that have been produced in this country, and I am informed that if they go into commission under the provisions of this bill it will increase the annual expense of operating each one of them by the sum of $75,000. This being so, if this line continues in operation, the bill would result naturally in laying upon this company an increased burden of $300,000 annually in the operation of these lines. This fact has been recognized very fairly and frankly by some of the advocates of the bill. Mr. Livernash, the author of this bill, had his attention called to this increased cost of operation when he was before the committee, and, referring to representations made to the committee by counsel for the company, he said:

It is because I know that representation to be true that I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana—that is, that if the provision under discussion were to be made law, it would be advisable, and perhaps necessary, to do something by way of subsidy or otherwise to enable American ships to meet on something like a common basis of expense those foreign competitors not obliged to employ white seamen, but left free to employ the cheaper Chinese labor.

However, the possible, or even probable, need of subsidy does not relieve the Congress of its duty toward the American seamen, nor absolve it from concern lest the progress of the world toward a great commercial expansion in the Far East shall operate to give the Pacific Ocean to yellow sailors rather than to white.

He had before that time used this language:

Speaking tentatively, for again I must remind the Senators that my information on this subject is comparatively vague, I will say that it seems to me probable something would have to be done for shipowners, by subsidization or otherwise, if the Congress should determine to drive Asiatics from American ships.

So I may say further, in referring to that provision, that the legislation is aimed directly at that company, and unless they do receive a subsidy they will inevitably be compelled to pass out from under the American flag.

It further appeared in evidence that no danger attaches to the United States, because these crews are all shipped in Hongkong. Their contract calls for a voyage to San Francisco and return to Hongkong, and they do not receive their pay until they reach that port. They are not allowed to land in the United States. Again, suppose this provision is adopted, and this steamship company or any other American company sees fit to establish a line between the Philippines and China, where they would be unable to procure other seamen than those of Chinese birth, it would be a double burden upon such a corporation and a direct prohibition, if I may use that word, upon the employment of American capital in the establishment of such an enterprise.

But the promoters of this bill go a step further in this direction and provide—

SEC. 39. That the master of any foreign vessel which shall bring to the United States in the crew of such vessel, or otherwise in its service, any Chinese persons not entitled to entry, shall be required to execute a bond satisfactory to the Treasury Department, in the sum of $2,000 for each of said Chinese persons, the condition of said bond being that none of such Chinese persons shall be permitted to land from said vessel for any purpose whatever, with or without the permission of said master, while said vessel remains within the United States. The bond shall be canceled upon the certificate of the appropriate Treasury officer that all Chinese persons covered by it have departed from the United States on said vessel.

What would be the operation of that section? Ninety per cent of the lines between Hongkong and San Francisco are foreign, largely British and Japanese. They come in and stay just long enough to unload their cargoes and take on others; and yet if a vessel came in bearing a crew of 100 men the master of that vessel must look around and execute a bond in the sum of $200,000 each and every time he comes into port, a bond to last only so long as his vessel shall remain there discharging her cargo.

I do not know, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances to know, what the effect of such a provision would be upon lines that are doing business on our Pacific coast; but it looks to me as if it is arbitrary in its character; that it does not bring any corresponding advantage to the United States. Other legislation can be made just as effective without being made burdensome to those companies that are bringing so much business to us.

I want also to say a word in relation to the proposal in this bill which gives to our officer on the dock in San Francisco the right to sit in judgment upon the certificates that are issued to the privileged classes by the Chinese Government and are viséed by American diplomatic and consular agents abroad. Article III of the treaty of 1894 reads as follows:

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein. To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States, they may produce a certificate from their Government or the government where they last resided viséed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

That is the provision contained in that treaty. The treaty was adopted subsequent to the enactment of every law bearing upon that question. It is evident that the treaty is superior to any law adopted previous to its ratification when the provisions of the treaty and the law conflict; and yet the practice of our Government has been to subject those coming from China to examination, and the right has been claimed and exercised to reject the certificates which have been granted by the Chinese Government and viséed by our diplomatic or consular representatives as sufficient evidence of the right to land.

I wish to speak a little upon the equities of the case. This conduct on our part has been justified, as the evidence tends to show, by the fact, asserted to be true, that our diplomatic agents abroad are careless in the exercise of their duty and do not make a proper examination of those who receive the Chinese certificates, and that for that reason it is necessary that this should be done.

I stand here to assert that if we have a State Department, that Department should take those officers in hand and see to it that if a person who, under the treaty, has a right to come to America, being one of the privileged classes, receives from his Government a certificate to that effect, such agents of the State Department should give such an examination to the matter as will enable them to speak with authority on that subject, and that when a person belonging to either privileged class steps upon the steamship at Hongkong or any Chinese port bearing such a certificate so viséed he shall do so with the consciousness that he has a document which will give him entrance into the United States. It is a wrong, it is a hardship to a subject of China, entitled under the treaty to come here, to be obliged to go to San Francisco to have his case tried and then have it determined whether he has the right to come into our country or not. It ought not to be so. It does not accord with our way of dealing with other nations.

In this connection, I may say, I received in my mail this morning a letter from a clergyman of my acquaintance, in which he says:

I know personally, they being my parishioners for six months, a Chinese preacher, who for years has spent himself in the Chinese quarter of New York City, whose wife was kept from him for more than two years under the present laws—

He means under the present administration of the law—and even though, finally, passports from our State Department were gotten into her hands—

He evidently means, by passports, the certificates required by the treaty—and the husband went to the coast for her, she was confined with the riffraff of the steerage for fully a month before one department of the Administration would recognize the papers of the other.

In other words, the Treasury Department, in the administration of the law, would not recognize papers provided for by the treaty which were issued by the agents of another department of the Government.

I wish to call attention to the merchant class provided for both under the treaty and by the provisions of this bill. The definition of "merchant" has often been quoted in this debate. I do not know that it is necessary that I should quote it again, but I will do so simply to call attention to it:

It must appear to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer at the port of entry that he comes to exercise in good faith his calling as a merchant, and that calling exclusively, and that he has the means under his immediate control for forthwith becoming, and has completed the arrangements for forthwith becoming, the owner, in whole or in part, of a good-faith mercantile business in the United States, or any portion of the territory thereof.

It is perfectly plain that under such a provision no person of the mercantile class can seek our shores unless he has already completed his arrangements for entering into trade at some definite place within our territory. Now, think of it! In this age of progress, when China is the only unexplored field for our commerce, when we are seeking to thrust our manufactures upon the merchants of China, a person engaged in trade in China can not so much as send to the territory of the United States a purchasing agent! I offered the other day an amendment which provides that in addition to the privileged classes mentioned in section 4 there may be permitted to come to the United States not to exceed five good-faith representatives of each regularly established wholesale commercial house in China.

The history of that amendment is this: The matter was discussed in committee. The draftsman of this bill signified his desire—a generous and fair desire—that such purchasing agents should be permitted to come into this country if it could be done without allowing a misuse of the statute to be made. After some consideration the author of the bill presented to the committee an amendment, of which this paper is an exact copy, or supposed to be an exact copy. It was incorporated in one of the prints of the bill, of which there were several. The discussion relating to the matter, if anybody is interested in reading it, will be found on pages 132 and 133 of the record. If they will refer to page 156 they will find in the parallel column provided by the author of the bill that this very provision was incorporated and explained, and at the bottom of the page they will find a note which gives the reason why the amendment was withdrawn. The second note says:

It is the desire of the California commission and the American Federation of Labor to withdraw their hesitating indorsement of this fifth section. On reflection it is felt that the experiment would result disastrously to American labor without compensating benefit to American commerce. Both the commission and the Federation have become convinced that the section should not be made law, even in an amended form.

The point is right here. Everybody interested with this legislation believes that we should allow China to send purchasing agents into this country; that if we would do so it would favor American commerce. This amendment was taken out of the bill because it was believed that enough might come in fraudulently under its provisions to compete with American labor. That is the only reason which can be urged against it. Mr. Dunn, the very efficient agent of the Government in San Francisco, stated to the committee that he had always been in favor of some provision of this kind; that he had consulted with the merchants of San Francisco regarding it, and that he had advised them that one ought to be adopted. He apparently was in full accord with the amendment when it was offered to the bill in committee, but after it had been withdrawn by its author Mr. Dunn also withdrew his approval of it, giving as his reason that given by the others—that too many laborers might be smuggled in through its provisions, and as a consequence the country might be filled with the yellow hordes. I am not using his language.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator would not claim, I presume, that the word "merchant" as used in the treaty would include what he designates as a purchasing agent?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Had I been called upon to construe the treaty, I should have construed it to mean that any person engaged in the mercantile trade in China should have the right to come to this country whether he made arrangements to go into business here or not. But that is not the question the Senator asked me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not exactly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think under the treaty a purchasing agent would be called a merchant, but I think it is a tremendous mistake for us as a nation not to put into either a treaty or a statute law the right of a Chinese merchant to send a purchasing agent here.

Mr. MITCHELL. The point I wish to accentuate is simply this: The Senator does not claim that by our failure to provide for the admission of purchasing agents we are transgressing any provision of the treaty?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Oh, no. I do claim, however, that as a matter of national policy it is a tremendous mistake if we do not adopt an amendment, either the one I have offered or something equivalent to it; and as an evidence of that fact I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a telegram that was sent by the business men of San Francisco to the President pro tempore of this body, which appeared in yesterday's RECORD. It escaped my attention when it was read in the morning, but it appears that the people of the Pacific coast have already become alarmed upon this subject. This telegram reads as follows:

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 8, 1902.

Hon. W. P. FRYE,

President of Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The exclusion of legitimate Chinese merchants that will result from the passing of the exclusion act now being debated in the Senate is an act of gross injustice to the mercantile and merchant interests of the Pacific coast, and of San Francisco in particular, and we hereby respectfully protest against such injustice and request that the bill be so amended as to freely and legitimately admit merchant class of Chinese. Any special committee insisting upon the exclusion of Chinese merchants does not voice the sentiment or desires of those interested in the mercantile welfare of San Francisco and in the development of the commerce of this port.

It seems to me, sir, that the laws enacted by Congress which affect trade, commerce, manufactures, and every branch of industry in our country should be broad, that they should be sane, that they should be equitable; laws that will protect capital in all of its rights, laws that will protect labor in all of its rights, laws that will protect manufactures and protect commerce, and give general prosperity to our nation.

It seems to me there is danger lurking in this bill if it is adopted in the form in which it has been presented. All admit that it is within the power of the Chinese Government to terminate the existing treaty on the 8th day of December, 1904, and if the Chinese Government sees fit to terminate the treaty at that time, in what position are we left?

It is not my purpose to enter into a lengthy discussion of the interpretation of these treaties. The Hon. John W. Foster, formerly Secretary of State, was before the committee, and when he was quoted by somebody upon the floor of the Senate recently the statement was made that he was the attorney of the Chinese Government. I do not know whether that be true or not. Admit, for the sake of the argument, that it be true. I do know that General Foster is a man of honor, a man of rare experience, of rare intelligence, and better fitted, perhaps, to speak with authority upon the interpretation of the various compacts between the United States Government and China than any man who appeared before the committee; and I stand here, sir, to say that I believe he has made a statement based upon honor, whether he be right in his conclusions or not. After examining these treaties, he says:

With this exact parallel before us, I need say no more to convince you that when the treaty with China of 1894 is terminated in 1904, Articles V and VI of the treaty of 1868 will again come into full force. They are as follows:

"ARTICLE V. The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free immigration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties, therefore, join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

"ARTICLE VI. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States."

The provisions of those sections would in no wise satisfy the demands of the public mind in America to-day. What would be the result? The Government of the United States must either negotiate a new treaty with China or she must exercise the power of adopting legislation which will be without authority of treaty stipulations and opposed to the existing treaty obligations. That the Government has that power I do not doubt. But has it the right? Whether the Government would exercise its power to do it I very much doubt; but whether the Government would do that or not, is it policy to adopt such legislation? With a treaty that may be abolished in two years, do we want to adopt legislation that will anger China, that will impress her as being oppressive, simply because we have the power to override treaty stipulations by legislative enactments? Is it good business policy? Ought we to take that risk? To use a homely phrase, will the game pay for the powder?

There are two methods of thought that have been presented to the committee. One of them is that China is always most friendly with those who approach her with shot and with shell, and the thought has been advanced to the committee that Japan's trade has increased because Japan approached China with shot and shell and because she wrenched one of her island possessions from her. I am free to admit that I have no sympathy with an argument of that kind, because I believe it is beneath the dignity and the character of a great government like the Government of the United States to adopt any such method toward a nation as defenseless as China. Not only that, but because it is manifestly wrong in morals for the nation to adopt such policy as that. Might is not synonymous with right.

There came before the committee Mr. John Foord, who represented the American Asiatic Association, the American Association of China, and the American Asiatic Association of Japan, "three organizations comprising a membership which I presume," he says, "conducts three-fourths of all the commerce between the United States and the Far East." His opinion is as follows:

You are aware that the commercial treaties are now being negotiated. You are also aware, of course, that this immigration treaty is not a commercial treaty, as some have hastily assumed. The commercial clauses of the treaty of Tientsin are now under negotiation, and we assume that we shall have the benefit of the most-favored-nation clause. We certainly ought to have it. We certainly ought to get as good terms as England, Germany, or France.

But, gentlemen, is it fair to assume that we can command these if we treat China in the most insulting and humiliating way in which one nation can treat another; if we are going to deal with China as if she were a nation of barbarians and, generally speaking, a weak people whom we could cuff and kick whenever we desired or cared to? Is it fair to assume that a nation which has entered upon a new phase of progress, with a new sense, I think, of rational dignity, a new sense of national responsibility, will always bend its cheek to the smiter? I think if you assume that, you are assuming altogether too much. As business men we think it would be a most dangerous assumption for the future of our trade.

That man speaks upon the authority of knowledge, of residence, of experience.

I beg to call your attention also to certain other testimony that was brought before the committee. I refer first to the testimony of Mr. Ellison A. Smythe, who says:

I represent a delegation of South Carolina manufacturers, consisting of five, who wish to make a few statements to you. South Carolina, perhaps you know, has over 2,000,000 spindles, and ranks second to Massachusetts in its cotton-mill industry and its importance.

I should like also to speak in behalf of the employers of those Southern cotton mills. In South Carolina, according to the figures of the present census, there are over 48,000 persons employed in the cotton mills. Largely the mill interest in the South is dependent upon the export trade, and this is peculiarly so with the trade to China.

This was very acutely felt during the depression incident to the war in China, and which lasted about twelve months, in its effect on the Southern millers. I doubt if there was one Southern mill or at least there were very few Southern mills that during the fiscal year ending last July were able to show any profit at all on their business during the preceding twelve months, and most of them showed very considerable losses, owing to the stagnation in trade, the piling up of their goods, and their inability to sell their products. And the efforts to get into other trades and to make other goods that were used in this country led to very fierce competition with the mills of the country that were built and that are devoted to the home trade.

It will be noted that in a single experience of a short disturbance in their trade with China the manufacturing State of South Carolina was thrown into a condition of despair. Their goods had been manufactured with reference to the foreign trade, and the moment that was interrupted they came into competition with the older mills in this country and immediately the depression was felt by all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact according to the statistics that the increase of cotton imports into China has gone right along—

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In the last six months very largely.

Mr. MITCHELL. Ever since—

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Ever since peace came.

Mr. MITCHELL. Ever since the Chinese-exclusion acts were put in operation there has been a gradual increase of cotton imports into China.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Ever since the exclusion acts were put into operation there has been a gradual increase of our trade with China. I am glad to admit it, but it has not been anywhere near so great as it ought to be, as I will show before I complete my remarks.

I wish also to refer briefly to the testimony of Mr. Clarence Cary, and I deem this very important. He is a member of the American China Development Company, and he says:

I merely wish to say that I have the honor to represent the American China Development Company, which is a large American company about to build perhaps 550 miles of railway in China, the main line extending from Hankow, on the Yangtze River, to Canton. I have had the fortune to be in China twice, and to stay there a considerable time, nearly a year the second time, and so I have acquired some little knowledge of the officials and their ways of looking at things and of this business.

Again:

The American China Development Company is about to embark upon the expenditure of a very large sum of money for the building of that railroad, for which all the supplies must practically come from the United States. The pine for the sleepers, the timbers, and so on must come from Oregon and the coast; the rails from everywhere convenient in the United States, and, in short, all the material must come from here. It is of very great consequence, therefore, to American merchants, mechanics, etc., that the way of that railway should be unimpeded by any careless or unkindly legislation.

The people whom I represent desire to be recorded here as being in favor of just what Mr. Foord and these other gentlemen have asked. We wish to be regarded as making no opposition whatever to the exclusion of Chinese labor, but as desiring that all existing treaty rights be carried on unimpeded.

Later on he takes up in his testimony the question of students and the importance of having them come to this country, and he says:

I might mention incidentally, as an illustration of the unnecessary restrictions, as I think, upon students and people of that sort, nonlabor people, a statement made to me the other day by Mr. Ferguson, who is a man in charge of a Chinese college at Shanghai. He said that they had found much difficulty about placing their students over here, and their students, please bear in mind, are picked young men, weeded out by a process of selection from the Chinese attendance upon the college, and sent here or elsewhere for final education. They are the young men, some of whom, at least, are to be the people of light and leading in after life in China, who will regulate their relations with foreign countries. This last year a number had just graduated at the college, and Mr. Ferguson thought of sending them to the United States. He wanted to do so, but concluded that the restrictions threatened and impending and existing were such that he would not encounter them. So they sent them to England, where there is, wisely, no restriction upon students. As a consequence, those young men will grow up full of English prejudices and notions, and at all events they will be entirely lacking in the American predilection which they would have otherwise obtained.

Again, Mr. Silas D. Webb, who speaks as a merchant and as a resident of China for many years, says:

But I have no hesitation in saying that if the merchants and students and travelers are treated as though they were the scum of the earth it will be reversed.

I may say—

And here he speaks about the guilds of China—

I may say that all business in China is done under a system of guilds, based very much on the lines of the Federation of Labor in the United States; and as that order follows the Chinese in that respect, I suppose the Chinese ought to regard it as a great compliment that their system is considered as the system to follow.

No person can go into business in China without being a member of the guild; that is, I mean business of any importance. I do not mean that he must be a member to be a huckster, or anything of that kind. The guild is governed in such a way that if the merchants should take a notion that the Americans were insulting them, they would have a meeting quietly and state that they did not want to do any business with Americans or handle American goods, and it would be utterly impossible for any business to be done. I speak of that in a general way, as far as merchants are concerned.

As to students, I wish to say that we have had an object lesson in that line in Japan. Students have been sent to different countries to be educated, and it has been an almost invariable rule that it is impossible for Americans to do business in those places in Japan where students have been educated either in Germany, England, or France.

In passing, I should say that no one of these gentlemen appearing before the committee expressed any objection to the exclusion policy of the United States, so far as it applies to Chinese laborers, but every one of them came here to protest against the adoption of any stringent provisions which should operate to keep from coming to our shores those of the privileged classes.

In passing also, I may say that you will understand with a moment's thought how important it is to us that the young of China, especially the picked young men coming from the Chinese colleges, who hereafter, in the language of one of these witnesses, are to be the light and leaders of the Chinese people, should be educated in our midst and imbibe our principles, and so be able to carry back with them to China those thoughts and those purposes that will operate for our national good.

Mr. President, we are becoming a great manufacturing nation. Prosperity reigns throughout our borders. Capital is employed. Labor meets a ready demand and good reward. Our home markets have been fully supplied by the manufacturers of this country, but as our mills have increased in number and in their output we have more than supplied these markets, and the whole nation to-day is looking out into the world to see where markets for American products can be found.

The development in China in the last three years has been most remarkable. China to-day is the great unexplored commercial field into which America can enter with her goods. Railroads are in progress of construction. Grants have been made for further railroads. Telegraphs connect China with her provinces and with the world. Steamboats are plying upon all the Chinese rivers as far as they are navigable, and travelers from America and the merchants of America freely enter the Empire both for pleasure and for gain.

I find in a Government publication, in a report upon the trade of China for 1896, that Mr. Grosvenor, of the British legation at Peking, warns his countrymen as follows:

Englishmen should watch carefully the development of events, remembering that the great rewards of enterprise will be to those who are first in the field.

I commend that advice to the statesmen of America in shaping their legislation so that the American manufactures and American commerce shall have the opportunity not inferior to that of other nations. We should have a first entrance into that great Empire if we would obtain and hold our share of its trade.

We have a good illustration of the importance of prompt action in the development of Japan. The railroads in operation there have been built by Englishmen and by Belgians. The result is that the materials for the construction of those railroads are brought from the country from which the builders came. They were equipped from the countries from which the builders came. The result has been that all of the supplies necessary for operating those railroads, from locomotives down to car seats, have been to a very large extent brought from England and from Belgium.

Mr. Cary, whom I have quoted, comes here pleading with this body. He is about to enter upon a great enterprise—the building of that great railroad in China. He asks that there shall be no legislation that shall be injurious to his interests. Suppose that the road is constructed. He comes to America for his locomotives and to buy his steel rails and to secure all of the supplies that enter into the equipment of a road almost a thousand miles in length, and just so long as the road runs and remains under American management naturally all its supplies will be sought in this country. Other nations are already in the field. They have taken advantage of its market. They have built up their trade.

Mr. John Barrett, who has made a study of the Chinese market, says that the present trade of China is about two thousand million dollars annually. Our share of that trade is only one-tenth, and yet Mr. Barrett, after a patient examination, says that we ought by right to have one-third of the whole. Suppose, he says, that China imports one thousand million dollars' worth of goods annually, and America should control one-third of that trade, it would give us a volume of exports amounting to $300,000,000 annually against the $12,000,000 that go into the Chinese ports at this time and another $12,000,000 probably that go into the port of Hongkong. It would increase our trade with the Chinese ports substantially 25 times in amount. Is not this an opportunity which we should consider when we are adopting legislation that so fully affects our relations with China?

The Senator from Oregon asked me the question a few moments ago if it was not true that our trade with China has increased since the exclusion laws were adopted. I answered frankly that it has. In 1880 we had less than a million dollars' worth of trade with China. In 1890 it had increased to $2,700,000. But we have not increased in ratio with the increase of other nations, and especially that of Great Britain. In 1880 Great Britain in round numbers had a trade with China of $54,000,000, and in 1890 of $81,000,000. In other words, at the end of ten years she had increased her annual trade $27,000,000. The United States in the same ten years had increased her trade only $1,800,000.

China the last ten years has another comparison. In 1890 Great Britain's trade with China was $81,000,000. In 1900 it had reached the enormous amount of $120,000,000. In other words, in those ten years Great Britain had increased her annual trade $39,000,000. In the same ten years the United States had increased her annual trade in the pitiful amount of $9,000,000.

Now, that tells the story. The United States of America is great to-day in her manufacturing interests and her commercial power and is fully prepared to compete with Great Britain in this great market. She ought to do it. She ought to have the opportunity to do it.

The sum and substance of this whole question, Mr. President, is that we should pass just and equitable laws for the protection of all classes. I would make the laws just as perfect for the protection of the wage-earner as they can be made. I would make them perfect for the protection of the manufacturer and the merchant. I would have the laws perfect for the nation as a nation.

To this end I suggest that we call upon our State Department to make every foreign representative of this Government, wherever he may be situated, but particularly in China, alive to a sense of his duty. Let us make the law so perfect that every one of our consular agents will make a thorough examination of every Chinaman who receives a certificate from his Government, so that any person may feel when he steps upon the deck of the vessel with his face toward America that when he reaches this continent he will be received gladly and by a friendly nation. To this end let us get rid of the burdensome features of this bill and, having done that, make it just as strong and just as perfect for the protection of American labor against Chinese labor as human ingenuity can do.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the question of Chinese immigration and their residence in this country is more than fifty years old. Soon after the discovery of gold in California the Six Companies of Chinese were organized. They were merchant companies, and they did business in this country. They imported Chinese as their principal business. The Chinese coolies were brought here under contracts in vast numbers. Those contracts provided for years of labor, and also stipulated that the Chinese at the end of that term should be returned to their native country, whether alive or dead. Every ship that went from the port of San Francisco to China took more or less dead Chinamen home. For the performance of these contracts the coolie was required to deliver his family as a hostage. They would not take him unless he could give some person as a hostage, to be substituted as a coolie in that country if he did not comply with his contract to labor in this country.

The Chinese came and first followed the California miners by gleaning in the sand and following up the worked-out ravines. They gathered large volumes of gold dust by their economical mode of mining.

In 1851 or 1852—I do not remember which—the legislature of California passed a very oppressive foreign-miners' tax, as it was called, taxing a very large sum annually every foreigner who mined. The tax was collected from the Chinese, and from no one else. It was collected in a very cruel manner. The Chinese had no friends. The collectors were boys. They went with their pistols and their bulldogs, and beat and maltreated the Chinese. I felt very much outraged at the inhumanity that was practiced against the Chinese.

In November, 1852, I was appointed district attorney of Nevada County, Cal., a very large and populous mining county. I attempted to stop the cruelty in that county and had some of the perpetrators fined before justices of the peace; but I could do nothing before a jury.

At the time I was appointed district attorney a murder of a Chinaman was committed by one George Hall. There were no witnesses but the Chinese present. We were at a loss how to administer oaths to the Chinese and whether any oaths would bind them. I called a meeting of a board of supervisors and requested them to come and consider what we would do in this murder case. It was suggested that an appropriation be made by the county of $5,000 to get experts to interpret and inform us how to administer oaths.

I sent to San Francisco and employed Rev. Dr. Spear, an Episcopal minister, who had been in China over twenty years. He was a man of high character, from Philadelphia, and was devoted to the Chinese. He had been all over the Chinese Empire, knew all their secrets, and felt a great interest in them.

I had the Chinamen put in different rooms, because they always told the same story. When they came before the jury, each one told the same story. There was no doubt that they told the truth substantially, but inasmuch as it is impossible for six men to see any transaction in the same light it was evident that they were manufacturing details and making them correspond. I asked Dr. Spear, as he was varying the language a little, if all their testimony was not substantially the same. He said it was.

There was no exception taken to the testimony. Hall was convicted. After his conviction I asked Dr. Spear to explain to me how it was that all those Chinamen told the same story, and whether any oath was binding upon them. With some reluctance he told me that he had been permitted to travel throughout China; that he had visited many of their courts of justice, or injustice; that they did not rely upon a Chinaman's word ordinarily, and that they did not rely upon his oath in the administration of justice; but they had instruments of torture at every one of the courts of justice which the outside world was not allowed to visit, and they would apply those to the witness before asking him any questions.

If he did not testify to suit them, they would torture him in a greater or less degree; and all the people were terrified with regard to the courts and with regard to the administration of justice, so that upon the commission of an offense they would meet together instantly and agree upon a story and all stand by the same story, and no torture could make them differ from it, and that exempted the majority from the punishment which would be otherwise inflicted.

The case of Hall was appealed to the supreme court of the State of California. I went there and supposed there would be no difficulty in having the judgment affirmed, inasmuch as there were no exceptions taken, and I made but a slight effort, stating the fact, as I would in any case, that, no exceptions having been taken, the judgment would have to be affirmed. Gen. John R. McConnell was on the other side. He made an elaborate argument to show that the Chinese were prohibited from testifying against white men under the statute that prohibited an Indian from testifying against a white man. The supreme court of California decided the case according to his argument. The syllabus of the decision of the court is as follows:

The people, respondent, v. George W. Hall, appellant.

Witness—Person incompetent.—Section 394 of the civil-practice act provides:

"No Indian or negro shall be allowed to testify as a witness in any action in which a white person is a party."

Item.—Section 14 of the criminal act provides:

"No black, or mulatto person, or Indian shall be allowed to give evidence in favor of or against a white man."

Held, that the words Indian, negro, black, and white are generic terms designating race; that, therefore, Chinese and all other peoples not white are included in the prohibition from being witnesses against whites. (See California Reports (Hepburn), vol. 4, p. 399.)

In his opinion Judge Murray goes extensively into the subject of the identity of the Indians and Chinese, and satisfies himself that they are of the same origin and that the statute applies to both alike.

Then the Chinaman was in California without a friend. He could not testify in court and he could not defend himself. I did not like that situation, and I pledged myself, whenever I could do so, to relieve it; so when an enforcement bill was pending in the Senate I secured an amendment, the latter part of which was drawn by me, the first part having been considered by the committee on the Judiciary, and put in. It is section 16 of "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," which is found in volume 16, page 144, of the Statutes at Large, and is as follows:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

This applies to Chinamen.

No tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any State upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country which is not equally imposed and enforced upon every person immigrating to such State from any other foreign country; and any law of any State in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void.

That did away with this odious tax, which was not so odious as the manner of its collection. This was in May, 1870. It was known at an early day that the Chinese were brought here under labor contracts. The laboring men in California in their first protest were against those contracts, as they are against labor contracts now. They were odious contracts, and there was great feeling against them.

In 1866 Mr. Burlingame went to China and created quite a sensation by his advocacy of more friendly relations with that Empire. He came here as a Chinese ambassador in 1868 with a large delegation of Chinese. The Senate repaired to the hall of the House of Representatives, where both Houses assembled to receive the delegation and to do them honor. There were ceremonies and dinners in Washington, in New York, and in San Francisco to do honor to those Chinese magnates.

A treaty was negotiated for free immigration of Chinese to this country.

Mr. HOAR. What treaty was that?

Mr. STEWART. The treaty of 1868.

Mr. HOAR. The Burlingame treaty?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; the Burlingame treaty.

The immigration rapidly increased. On the 2d of July, 1870, the Senate had under consideration a House bill "to amend the naturalization laws and to punish crimes against the same." An agreement having been entered into to vote on the bill and its amendments at 4 o'clock p. m. on that day, about ten minutes before the vote was taken Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, offered the following amendment to the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee to the House bill:

And be it further enacted, That all acts of Congress relating to naturalization be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the word "white" wherever it occurs, so that in naturalization there shall be no distinction of race or color.

I refused to be bound by the agreement if that amendment were voted on to the bill. I contended that it was another subject, and that we had not agreed to vote upon it. In fact, it had been reported by the Judiciary Committee as a separate bill, and if the two bills were put together, I contended I was not bound by the agreement. My statement created considerable excitement. My friends advised me not to break an agreement of that kind. I told them that they did not understand the magnitude of the question which was presented. There was a struggle for some time over the question whether I should speak, and I yielded, but protested against the bringing in of such a proposition at such a time. Finally a vote was taken on it, and it was beaten by a few votes.

Mr. HOAR. Without debate, or did the debate go on?

Mr. STEWART. There was some irregular debate, but the Congressional Globe shows that there was no regular debate. I protested against the proposed course of procedure, but there was no regular discussion. A vote was taken, and the proposition was rejected as an amendment to the Senate amendment to the House bill. The Senate amendment was offered as a substitute, and was voted down. Mr. Conkling then offered a section of the Senate amendment to be added to the House bill. Then Mr. Sumner again offered his proposition as an amendment to the House bill. The proceedings were as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves an amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That all acts of Congress relating to naturalization, be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the word 'white' wherever it occurs; so that in naturalization there shall be no distinction of race or color."

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I have to say that that is worth all the rest of the bill put together. That is a section that is pure gold. It will do more for the character, and honor, and good name of this Republic than all the rest of the bill. I am for the rest of the bill, but this is better than all the rest. Now I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. That is a proposition to extend naturalization, not to those who desire to become citizens, but to those who are being imported as slaves. I propose first to abolish slavery. I propose to liberate these persons before they shall be naturalized by their masters for the purpose of carrying elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I appeal to my friend? I appeal to him to let us vote, because if this amendment is adopted I shall certainly absolve him from any agreement, and he may then talk as long as he likes; but, inasmuch as I vote against this amendment solely upon the ground that in honor I can not go for it here when his mouth and the mouths of others are closed, I hope he will let us vote. If we are to have a full debate I shall vote for the amendment.

The vote was taken after that speech, and the provision was incorporated in the bill by a vote of 27 to 22. The yeas and nays were as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Conkling, Fenton, Fowler, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, Lewis, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, and Trumbull.

Nays—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Casserly, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howell, Johnston, McCreary, Morton, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Vickers, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson.

The debate continued very actively until 7 o'clock on Saturday, the 2d of July, when the Senate adjourned, of course being unable to make any arrangement to adjourn over the 4th of July. So on Monday, the 4th of July, the question was again debated with great earnestness during all of that day. As a specimen of the character of that debate, I will insert some extracts in my speech, but I wish now to call attention to the way the matter was treated by the then Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, and myself. In the course of his speech Mr. Sumner said:

Why introduce the topic into debate? Is there a Senator on this floor who will say that from anything done or said by Chinese at this moment there is any reason to fear peril to this Republic? Sir, the greatest peril to this Republic is from disloyalty to its great ideas. Only in this way can peril come. Let us surrender ourselves freely and fearlessly to the principles originally declared. Such is the way of safety. How grand, how beautiful, how sublime is that road to travel! How mean, how dark, how muddy is that other road which has found counselors to-day! Listening to the speech of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] more than once, nay, thrice over denying the Declaration of Independence, I was reminded of an incident in the Gospels. I have the book from the desk of the Secretary and now read the pertinent passage; it is in Matthew, chapter xxvi:

"Now Peter sat without in the palace: and a damsel came unto him, saying, Thou also wast with Jesus of Galilee."

"But he denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest."

"And when he was gone out into the porch, another maid saw him, and said unto them that were there, This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth."

"And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man."

"And after a while came unto him they that stood by, and said to Peter, Surely thou also art one of them; for thy speech bewrayeth thee."

"Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man. And immediately the cock crew."

"And Peter remembered the word of Jesus, which said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly."

Sir, thrice has a Senator on this floor denied these great principles of the Declaration of Independence. The time may come when he will weep bitterly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator give way to me for one moment? I want to reply to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. Because I am opposed to pagan imperialists, Chinese who do not understand the obligation of a Christian oath, being incorporated in the body politic, the Senator from Massachusetts reads from a Christian book, from the Bible, to prove that I have denied my faith. He, desiring to place the destinies of the country, as he certainly would those of the Pacific coast, in the hands of pagan imperialists, will say that my opposition to that policy is denying the faith.

When he wants to place the destinies of the country in their hands, when he proposes to trust to their oaths as to whether they renounce their old allegiance or not when they can not take a Christian oath, he has denied the principles which he professes; he has denied the Declaration of Independence when he would place the guardianship of our institutions in such hands and under the control of such mercenary wretches as deal in coolies who swear to labor for them. That is a denial of the faith. He that would trust our institutions to such hands has verily denied the faith.

When I seek to preserve our institutions in the hands of a Christian people; when I desire to retain those institutions in the hands of those who understand the obligations of an oath when they renounce their allegiance to foreign potentates and powers and join their lot with us; when I refuse to let Koopmanschap and the Chinese merchants to import coolies to be naturalized at their dictation to participate in preserving our free institutions, I have the Christian Bible read to me, and I am compared to him who would deny the faith! I say that any Christian gentleman, any Christian man who will trust our institutions to the hands of pagans has denied the faith of his fathers.

Subsequently I said:

Mr. STEWART. Now, before the vote is taken, I wish to state that if that question, which is another question altogether, is introduced now to be voted upon, without giving a word of explanation, I shall not be bound by any agreement, because this is another proposition; it does not relate to the subject of the original bill. It is a separate proposition. If that is to be put on this bill, then we are not bound by any arrangement, because it is necessary that the Senate shall know what they are voting for and how they are voting before this is voted upon. I desire to be heard, and must be heard, on a proposition of that character, which we of the Pacific coast have more knowledge of than others here. I shall not be bound by any agreement if it is to be acted upon now and put upon this bill. I shall desire to be heard upon it before it is voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no power to enforce the agreement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Nevada will set no such example as that by insisting that he will not be bound by an understanding. Everybody knows what this means.

Mr. THURMAN. It has been printed on our tables for months.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator from Massachusetts offers it now, does he not see the effect?

Mr. SUMNER. The proposition has been here four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Nevada can not afford to set this example.

Mr. STEWART. But this is bringing in another bill. I want to submit this proposition to the Senate: Here are two distinct bills pending, involving altogether different principles; does an agreement to vote a certain time upon one bill bind the Senate to take up another bill and put it upon that bill without a chance to say a word? I undertake to say that it is not germane, and upon that point I have a right to be heard. The proposition was that we should vote on a bill to regulate naturalization as to persons now entitled to receive it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask my friend a question. He says that this in principle is different; will he state how?

Mr. STEWART. I say it is not germane. There are two different propositions. The proposition that we agreed to vote upon was simply a proposition to regulate naturalization among the persons now entitled to naturalization. The proposition introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts is to extend naturalization to a different class involving a different subject, and it is well known here that it will be discussed, and discussed thoroughly. It is a separate bill, one that has been kept separate by the Judiciary Committee, and we are not bound by the agreement when that is sought to be attached—

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote.

Mr. STEWART. Do not put it on this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (to Mr. WILSON). This is a matter that you will find of more consequence than you imagine. I want the people of Massachusetts to understand that Massachusetts Senators are here trying to—

Mr. WILSON. I am not going to vote for it.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the whole bill on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FOWLER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Abbott]. If he were here he would vote "nay" on this proposition, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. VICKERS. My colleague [Mr. Hamilton] and Mr. Osborn have paired off on this question. The latter would vote against and the former for this motion.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 30; as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Bayard, Casserly, Corbett, Davis, Howe, Howell, Johnston, McCreery, McDonald, Morton, Robertson, Ross, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Vickers, and Williams—17.

Nays—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fenton, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harlan, Harris, Kellogg, Lewis, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Revels, Rice, Schurz, Scott, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Warner, and Wilson—30.

Absent—Messrs. Abbott, Ames, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Ferry, Flanagan, Fowler, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Pratt, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Willey, and Yates—25.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner].

Mr. MORTON. One word. This amendment involves the whole Chinese problem. Are you prepared to settle it to-night?

Mr. STEWART. Without discussion.

Mr. MORTON. And without discussion? The country has just awakened to the question, and to the enormous magnitude of the question, involving a possible immigration of many millions, involving another civilization, involving labor problems that no intellect can solve without study and without time. Are you now prepared to settle the Chinese problem, thus in advance inviting that immigration? I am not prepared to do it. (Congressional Globe, part 6, second session Forty-first Congress, p. 5122.)

That was the style of the debate that went on here.

Mr. HOAR. Who came out ahead?

Mr. STEWART. I will tell you who came out ahead. We went on with this debate until about 1 or 2 o'clock on the morning of the 5th. By that time I was largely reinforced. We then took a vote, and the amendment of Mr. Sumner, which had been theretofore adopted, was beaten by 14 to 30.

The vote was as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Fenton, Fowler, Harris, Howe, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, and Trumbull—14.

Nays—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harlan, McCreery, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Scott, Stewart, Stockton, Thayer, Thurman, Tipton, Vickers, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—30.

Before the debate the amendment had carried by 27 yeas to 22 nays; but after the debate it was beaten by 14 to 30.

If we had failed in that contest, of course there would have been a great many Chinese citizens, and there would have been no exclusion bills pending now. That would have ended the matter; but knowing the Chinese as I did, and knowing very well that they would be brought here by the millions under the control of these Chinese merchants, I resisted it. Koopmanschap, the great Chinese importer, at that time proposed to take the Chinamen to the South to labor there. They were brought here by the thousand, and most of them were brought under labor contracts.

If no Chinaman had ever come here except those who had come voluntarily and of their own accord, we should never have had any large Chinese immigration. The coolies can not come; they have no money with which to come; the great mass of them are too poor to come, and the laboring people of China could not come unless they were brought here by labor masters, and most of them have been brought here by labor masters. A few who are here have saved up a little by some arrangement with the Chinese merchants who brought them here, and they can go back to China and return, but I do not suppose that 20,000 Chinese have come to this country with their own money and of their own accord.

The contracts made with them are most horrible, and the mode of securing them is most disgusting. They have to pledge their families as hostages, and if they can not get their families to do that, they get some friend to act as a hostage, to be a peon and slave, if those who come to this country fail to comply with their contracts. I have examined those contracts with care, and I spoke of them in the debate to which I have referred at considerable length. I have had them read and exposed them to the Senate a great many times. As I have said, they were horrible contracts, under which the Chinamen were brought here, and if the door were open to their admission that is the way they would be brought here again.

I have assisted in the passage of the various laws relating to the Chinese in 1878, in 1888, and in 1890. I have assisted in the passage of all the laws which have been enacted—the Geary Act and the Scott Act; and those acts have been effective. There has been no inflow of Chinese worth mentioning during the existence of those acts.

There is now, as there was not then, a universal conviction that Chinese laborers are not desirable and must not come here; but the question is now understood in all parts of the country. The Chinamen who have remained in the country have scattered into different portions of it. Many undoubtedly have got into this country improperly; and the object now is to keep more of them from coming here.

We want to preserve our labor against the competition of cooly labor. American labor and Anglo-Saxon labor can not compete with the labor of Chinamen. It never has and never can, for the Chinese can live on less; they can work more hours, and they have economies that look to us as the essence of cruelty, and they endure them; but our people can not do so, and we must not bring them down to the level of the Chinese.

It has now become the settled judgment of the American people that the Chinese must be kept out. Let us do that by effective laws, which will keep them out. Suppose we should reenact the Geary law, which was predicated upon the treaty; suppose we should reenact the Scott law, which was to go into effect at the ratification of a treaty, but which treaty was never ratified; suppose we reenact those laws in positive terms.

The Department would continue the regulations for their enforcement and make additional ones for that purpose when necessary, and we should then have the law expressed in a few words.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not know that I fully caught what the honorable Senator said a moment ago; but, if I heard him aright, it was to the effect that the adoption of a brief law extending existing laws would have the same effect as the proposed law. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. STEWART. I said that a brief law would have an equally good effect.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then, such a law would be as far-reaching as the bill which is now pending, if I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. STEWART. No; I did not say that.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I put it in the interrogative.

Mr. STEWART. No; I did not say that. I said the regulations made for the enforcement of existing law could continue until they were changed by competent authority.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then, by those regulations, you would have in effect the same restrictive measures that you have in the pending bill, the difference being that the Treasury Department might modify those regulations, while it could not modify the terms of this law.

Mr. STEWART. The Treasury Department always has authority to alter its own regulations if it is found that they are inefficient or working unjustly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The bill is as voluminous as it is because there are incorporated in it the rules and regulations which have been found to be reasonable and effective. The suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada is met by the proposition that it is not desired that there should be flexibility along a line that would result in the Secretary of the Treasury, who might happen to be favorably inclined to the admission of Chinese, modifying it so as to break down the barriers. The Senator from Nevada will see, when Senators speak about flexibility, that it means power to change, to modify, to suspend, or even to make more severe.

These rules and regulations are those which have been in force and have been found to be effective and are believed by the officers of the Treasury Department to be in accord with the real spirit of the treaties and statutes, and therefore they do not desire to leave them in a position where one who does not live upon the Pacific coast and who has not the same reason for opposition to the Chinese may break down the barriers.

Mr. STEWART. I find that the anxiety to exclude Chinese in the East is now quite as strong as it is in the West.

Sentiment against Chinese immigration is too strong for any Government officer to disregard, and the regulations will be as strict and comprehensive as the people of the United States desire.

While importers of Chinese coolies were free to bring all the labor they desired to this country, the baneful effects of Chinese on the Pacific coast were acknowledged by all. Labor was demoralized. They invaded every point—the household, the kitchen, the factory, on the farm, and everywhere else—with rates of wages with which white men could not compete.

Our Eastern friends could not realize what competition with Asiatic labor meant, but now they understand the question and are as much opposed to the coming of Chinese in Pennsylvania as they are in California. China herself recognized, in the Burlingame treaty, the evil of the importation of Chinese to this country and agreed in that treaty to pass laws to prevent the cooly traffic. But she was unable to accomplish what she promised in that treaty. She undertook to prevent Chinese coming under contract. All her efforts were ineffective in that regard.

After the United States refused naturalization to Chinese, in 1870, the traffic in coolies still continued. Finally, in 1880, Congress was compelled to act to prevent the importation of Chinese, because China was unable to keep them at home. The few that are now here illustrate how difficult it would be for American laborers to live and prosper if the doors were opened to Chinese immigration.

I have no doubt the present bill will be put in such shape as to be agreeable to all. I think that it would be better to reenact the Geary and the Scott laws, make them operative wherever the jurisdiction of the United States extends, and then trust to their enforcement under regulations made by the Department. But when the bill under consideration is so modified as to meet the views of the Senate I shall give it my support. I have no fear that a law will not be passed within a few days which will exclude Chinese. The sentiment of the whole country demands it, the safety of labor demands it, and Congress will comply with such demands. The situation is not now as it was in 1870, when the struggle lasted over the 4th of July to prevent the extension of the right of naturalization to the millions of Asiatic coolies who were being imported into the country. The sentiment is universal, or nearly so, that Chinese laborers shall not be permitted to come here. The earnest discussion of this bill shows too plainly the determination of the people which is behind it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not mean to debate this bill, because I have had other occupations and engagements of a public character, both in the Senate and elsewhere, since it has been pending, which have prevented me from giving the attention to its detail that its importance demands and certainly would require if I were to undertake to say anything which would be of value to the Senate. So I wish merely to state the general principle which will govern my vote.

I am not indifferent and never have been and never shall be indifferent to anything which threatens the lofty quality of American citizenship; and I regard this question, as do the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and other Senators who have spoken, while other considerations affect it also, as mainly a question of the quality of American citizenship. That is what warrants all our immigration laws, whether directed to immigration from Europe or immigration from Asia. It was expected by our forefathers, who laid down and declared the great doctrines which they supposed would govern the life of this country, and especially the doctrine of the absolute equality of all human beings in political rights, that the process of becoming American citizens, and therefore exercising a share jointly with others in the regal function—a function loftier than that of any emperor or king, as they regarded it—of governing this country, would be a very serious thing.

In the time of Washington and his immediate successors naturalizations were very rare, and when they took place the judge of the court of the United States in my part of the country, and I suppose elsewhere, used to address the new citizen with a little speech, pointing out to him the great advantage and dignity to which he had acceded, and welcoming him into the lofty brotherhood of American citizenship, and that was preceded by an inquiry, which meant business, into the character and quality of the new citizen.

There was no perfunctory admission. There was no taking a thousand oaths in a thousand seconds. There was no band of political agents hurrying into citizenship men for the purposes of any party. There was no such thing as the same two witnesses swearing to the same facts about a hundred men at once, and there was no such thing, as happened in New York not many years ago, of issuing naturalization papers in blank by the court, so that the inquiry showed that the judge who held that court must, if the papers had been genuine, have naturalized 60,000 persons in a single day.

That is the kind of administration which the men who made and believed in the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, and who passed our early naturalization laws meant to have practiced in order to insure the dignity and purity of American citizenship.

Now, I was in the other House, and later in this Chamber, when this great change of public opinion took place. When I came to Congress the Burlingame treaty had just been adopted, and we were making our boast that here was a nation, to use Mr. Lowell's famous lines—

Whose free latchstring was never drawn in
Against the poorest child of Adam's kin.

And the whole American people believed that doctrine. California herself believed it quite as religiously as did Massachusetts.

The great evil came up which the Senator from Nevada has so well stated and without any exaggeration, and the evil in regard to some classes of European immigration which my colleague had occasion to state, in advocating a bill under consideration a year or two ago, with equal force and precision of statement, because, Mr. President, these things are not matters of race. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who is now out of his seat, described the condition of things in the Chinese quarter in San Francisco. It happened that when this debate came up some time ago I asked a very eminent citizen of that coast, one of the champions of this class of legislation, if he had not gone through the like place in London at a recent visit, as the newspapers said, and he said he had; and I asked him if everything which he described of the vile places in San Francisco was not paralleled and surpassed by similar infamy and squalor and human degradation in places in London, where he found nobody but men of the English race. He admitted that that was true. It is not race. It is degradation that we ought to strike at and keep out if we can.

Mr. President, the objection to the whole theory on which our Chinese legislation proceeds is that you strike at labor, the dignity and glory of humanity, because it is labor, and you strike at men not because of any individual degradation, but solely because of race. You say that the Chinese laborer shall be kept out though he possesses every virtue under heaven, and the Syrian laborer or the laborer from any other Asiatic country shall come in though he possesses every vice under heaven, and then you say that a man shall stay out if he is a laborer, although he may come in if he is a scholar or a gentleman or an artist. So this great Republic puts itself on record that men differ essentially in the matter of human rights because of race and not because of the quality of the individual, and that the laborer is a degraded being in comparison with the scholar or the gentleman or the idler. Now, that is a stab at the essential principle on which this Republic rests, and for one I will not mark the close of my life, as my eyes are about to close, by joining in such an act in consequence of any alleged or fancied necessity.

When this subject first came up, and when the uneasiness under the Burlingame treaty was just beginning to show itself on the Pacific coast and had not reached the rest of the country, I sought out Mr. Sargent, then an eminent member of the House of Representatives from California (that was, I suppose, about 1871 or 1872; I can not give the date), who was afterwards an eminent member of this body and, as is well known, minister to Germany, and called his attention to it.

I told him I would gladly unite in measures which should be as effective and stringent as human wit could contrive to keep out everything of the evil of which his people were beginning to complain; that I would agree to station at one port or two ports or five ports in Asia public agents—public agents who should examine man by man, witness by witness—agents who could not be imposed upon and who could not be flattered and who could not be bribed, and provide that no immigrant should come to this country from China except such as came from that limited number of ports and such as had passed this scrutiny of our public agencies. If the time for such an examination would not allow examining thoroughly and faithfully every man who wanted to come, that was the misfortune of the situation, and it was necessary for the protection and security and quality of American citizenship. But it was no violation of our principles.

I was willing, then, that no man should come as an immigrant who could not read or write the English language, if that were desirable; that no man should come as an immigrant who did not bring his wife with him, if he were married, and his children with him, if he were a father; that no man should come as an immigrant whose moral qualities and capacity to earn his living in some respectable employment were not ascertained; that no man should come as an immigrant who did not mean to stay here and die here and be buried here and renounce all his allegiance to every other country whatever, and that no man should come as an immigrant who was not permeated with the spirit of American citizenship.

But some of our friends on the Pacific coast did not care much about ideals, though I have no doubt they were as thoroughly attached in principle to the doctrines on which this Republic was founded as I was, but in their anxiety and alarm they could not wait patiently to get at this evil.

So, in the first place, they broke a treaty, and in the next place they contradicted the doctrines which the fathers had declared; and although I suppose my friend the Senator from Nevada, as I do, considers Mr. Sumner's impassioned denunciation of him as rather a jest—I do not mean Mr. Sumner meant it as a jest, for he never jests, but my friend, I have no doubt, took it as a jest, just as I did—

Mr. STEWART. It did not hurt my feelings any.

Mr. HOAR. I do not suppose it did the least in the world. It did not hurt his feelings or stop the growth of his hair.

Mr. STEWART. That is true.

Mr. HOAR. But still, for all that, the thing happened, and so it is that we are going on from step to step. We could not wash out this spot with water, and so we took vinegar; and we could not wash it out with vinegar, and so we tried a solution of cayenne pepper, and now our friends on the Pacific coast are asking us for a preparation of vitriol, which they hope will work.

For one, Mr. President, I am not going into the details of this measure. I will not bow the knee to Baal—either in dealing with the Philippine Islands or with the Chinese. I will not vote that labor as labor shall not stand on an equality with other conditions of men. I will not vote that it is a falsehood that any nation has the right to establish its own government after its own fashion. I will not worship this god that you have set up. My opposition to this policy has nothing to do with the details of the measure.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to submit a very few remarks upon the pending bill. I do not care about doing so to-night.

Mr. STEWART. It is too late to speak to-night.

Mr. PETTUS. If the Senator will allow me, I will move—

Mr. TELLER. I should like to take the floor and go on in the morning.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it is understood that the Senator from Colorado has the floor—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to propose an amendment?

Mr. PETTUS. I was going to make a motion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there any amendment pending to the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two committee amendments were passed over.

Mr. PENROSE. I have a committee amendment which I desire to offer at the proper time before we adjourn. I merely make the statement so that the Senate may not pass on the motion to adjourn until I have had that opportunity.

Mr. TELLER. Offer it now.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senate to consider now a committee amendment which I think meets with the approval of everyone, and to which there will be no objection.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I suggest to the Senator, as section 56 was passed over, that that amendment be disagreed to and this one adopted.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The floor was yielded by the Senator from Colorado to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PENROSE. Excuse me, Mr. President; I did not understand that. May I proceed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I do not yield for the purpose of bringing up new business, but I thought the Senator from Pennsylvania wanted to offer some formal morning business.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I desire on behalf of the Committee on Immigration, having the bill in charge, to offer an amendment which I think should be placed immediately before the Senate, and to which there will be no objection, so that the bill as recommended by the committee may be printed and considered by the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to offer it now. It will take but a minute. I merely desire to have it read and passed on. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read and lie over.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have the amendment read, and then I shall ask to have it considered.

On page 53 of the bill there is an amendment of the committee which was passed over when the bill was read, and which I ask be not agreed to. Then I shall offer as a substitute for the section the amendment which the Secretary has in his hand. I ask that section 56 be disagreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The committee amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. It is a committee amendment, and I ask that it be disagreed to. It is the section prohibiting the admission of Chinese in connection with expositions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the amendment reported by the committee as section 56 be disagreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. Now I move as a substitute for section 56 what I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes an amendment as a substitute, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 56. That nothing in the provisions of this act or any other act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any foreign exhibitor, representative, or citizen of any foreign nation, or the holder, who is a citizen of any foreign nation, of any concession or privilege from any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of their respective foreign countries, as they or any of them may deem necessary, not exceeding such maximum number in each case to be authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of making preparation for installing, or conducting their exhibits or of preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized, or permitted under or by virtue of, or pertaining to any concession or privilege which may have been or may be, granted by any such fair or exposition in connection with such exposition, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, both as to the number, admission, and return of such person or persons.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator who has offered that amendment a question? I do not know whether I heard it correctly, but I understand it is an authority to bring in any number of cool laborers for that purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. It only allows a number not exceeding a maximum number to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury in each particular case.

Mr. HOAR. They may be cool laborers owned by the man who brings them in, as I understand it.

Mr. PENROSE. It refers to Chinese persons regardless of the fact whether they are laborers or whether they belong to the accepted classes.

Mr. HOAR. As I understood the argument of the Senator from Nevada, and it has been stated also by others, the object is to prevent the bringing into this country of cool laborers, and this policy is justified on the ground that cool laborers were to be brought in by persons who own them.

Mr. PENROSE. All these people are to be returned.

Mr. HOAR. I understand.

Mr. PENROSE. They are all to go back.

Mr. HOAR. Then the Senator and I agree. I understand he does not question it. But he proposes to put in an amendment that for some particular purpose, for a specially important national exposition, a lot of cool laborers may be brought in by their owners. That is the purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. The purpose is that Chinese persons having a concession for an exposition may bring in such persons as are necessary for the purposes of that particular concession without inquiry on our part as to their relations with the various individuals holding that concession. They are all to be returned when the exposition is over.

Mr. HOAR. So that if the Sultan of Sulu, if there be such a person, has slaves, as it is said by some hot-headed, wrong-minded men in this world, and chooses to bring in a lot of slaves and take them back again, we authorize him to do it.

Mr. STEWART. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the contractors are the owners of these laborers in the literal sense of the term. They enter into a contract providing for their services, and in case they should break the contract their relatives, who are pledged to it, would be their slaves.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] supplemented that by saying that these persons were in a condition of practical slavery; that they not only pledged their wives and children, body and soul, at home, but their relatives, to carry out their contracts, and if they break them there were contrivances by which the man who breaks them might be punished by assassinating him, and that was done, according to the statement of the Senator from California.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator let me add to that statement right here that they have employed what they call highbinders, and if a man breaks a contract the highbinders go to him and he is frequently put out of the way? That is in addition to the pledge of their relatives that they would perform the contract.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that, in a bill proposing to strike at that wickedness, the committee, or the agent of the committee, proposes to insert a clause saying that that precise thing may be done for the purposes of a public exposition.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I should like to offer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida propose an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir; to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, let the amendment of the Senator from Florida be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, page 2, strike out all after the word "since" down to and including the word "hereafter" in line 8.

Mr. MALLORY. The amendment strikes out the following language:

And it shall also apply to those who have been born there since, and to those who may be born there hereafter.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state that I am authorized on behalf of the committee to accept the amendment as offered. I ask for the present consideration of it by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the amendment stated. What is it?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a motion to strike out.

Mr. MALLORY. The object of it is simply to leave open the question of the right of people born in the Philippine Islands since the acquisition of that territory to come to this country.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the amendment read again. I want to take advantage of this opportunity to give notice that, with the consent of the Senate, I shall make some remarks upon this bill on Monday next immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment of the Senator from Florida be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, after the word "since," strike out the words "and it shall also apply to those who have been born there since, and to those who may be born there hereafter."

Mr. FORAKER. That is an exceedingly important amendment. It may be that it is exactly right. I assume that it is.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that it be acted upon.

Mr. FORAKER. It doubtless accomplishes the purpose the Senator from Florida has in view in offering it, and that the committee have in view in accepting it, but I would be glad to have it printed and go over before the Senate acts on it.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand it, the action will not be final. I ask to have it inserted in the bill—

Mr. FORAKER. Very well; I do not object to that.

Mr. PENROSE. So that the committee bill may be before the Senate in its perfected shape.

Mr. FORAKER. That is all right. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is agreed to without objection.

Mr. FORAKER. That clause of the bill is one that I should like to have the right to look at more carefully before it is finally disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. Now I ask for a unanimous-consent agreement that we may vote on this bill on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MITCHELL. Fix an hour.

Mr. PENROSE. At 4 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. Commencing at 4 o'clock?

Mr. PENROSE. Commencing at 4 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. To commence voting on amendments at that hour?

Mr. PENROSE. To commence voting on amendments at 4 o'clock, with five-minute debate on the different amendments.

Mr. FRYE. The debate to be under the limitation of Rule VIII?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Then we ought to begin earlier.

Mr. PENROSE. I will make the hour 3 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. We ought to know, before we agree to this arrangement, whether we will have two more days this week or whether we will have but one.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senate is going to sit on Saturday, because I gave notice that I would speak on that day immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. TELLER. If we are to have a session on Saturday the question is somewhat different from what it would be if we were not going to have a session on that day.

Mr. LODGE. And I should be glad to have the President of the Senate here at that time.

Mr. TELLER. I think the time is rather short.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I will make it Tuesday.

Mr. TELLER. That is better.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill be voted on Tuesday, subject to the five-minute rule after 3 o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he expects to insist on the passage of the Senate bill that came from the Committee on Immigration, or does he expect to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that both bills are substantially the same.

Mr. CLAY. They are not exactly the same.

Mr. PENROSE. No; they are not exactly the same.

Mr. CLAY. If we are expected to take the House bill, many of us have not gone through it to ascertain all of its contents, and we ought to have more time than would be given by an agreement to vote on Monday.

Mr. LODGE. If I may be allowed, I take it that the parliamentary situation and manner of dealing with it would be that after the Senate has amended and perfected its bill, whether it passes the bill with amendments as it came from the committee or whether it substitutes the bill of the Senator from Connecticut, it would then strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and put in its own bill as an amendment so as to bring both into conference.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand that several Senators who expect to take part in this debate are not here. Therefore I suggest that we wait until to-morrow morning and settle this question when there are more Senators present.

Mr. PENROSE. All right, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. That will do just as well.

Mr. PENROSE. I notified the Senate yesterday that I would make the request to-day. However, I will wait until to-morrow and renew it then.

Mr. TELLER. There is rather a thin Senate now. I understand that some Senators who are opposed to the bill have expressed a desire to be here when an agreement to vote is made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand that no amendment is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is one committee amendment pending.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that the committee amendments have been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were amendments passed over.

Mr. LODGE. The passed-over amendments are still pending. One of the most important clauses of the bill to be discussed is involved in such an amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did wish to propose the amendment of which I gave notice, but I will wait until the amendments of the committee are disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. You had better submit it now.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is.

Mr. LODGE. It can not be offered until the original bill is perfected.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was willing to wait until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon; there are a great many other amendments to be disposed of. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has nearly a dozen amendments that he intends to propose to the bill, some of which are very important amendments. I speak with deference to the superior knowledge of the Senator from Connecticut, but we must complete or perfect the bill before the substitute will be in order.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I understand the parliamentary rule to be that a substitute for a bill may be offered whenever a member of the Senate desires, and it may be pending, and that still amendments perfecting the bill or amendments perfecting the substitute are in order. That does not come within the rule that there can be but one amendment pending at once. If the Senator from Connecticut offers his amendment at this moment, all amendments to the pending bill will be considered first or all amendments to his substitute will be considered before the vote is taken on that.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly. That is what I said.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then I will offer my amendment, if I may have the opportunity to do so, at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent into the United States, and the residence of such persons therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect until the 7th day of December, 1904, and so long as the treaty between China and the United States concluded on the 17th day of March, 1894, and proclaimed by the President on the 8th day of December, 1894, may be continued in force by virtue of the extension thereof in accordance with the provisions for such extension therein contained. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to make and prescribe and from time to time to change and amend such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper to execute the provisions contained in the second paragraph of article 3 of said treaty of December 8, 1894.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut, if I may, whether it would not be well to have the time a little later than the 7th of December, 1904. That will be the very beginning of a session, so that if anything should happen, as a termination of the treaty, in the summer there might have to be an extra session of Congress called or we might have to deal very hastily with a condition of things. Would it not be as well to say the 7th of January or the 7th of February, 1905?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The idea of my amendment is to continue existing laws just as they are until the expiration of the treaty, whether it shall expire on the 7th day of December by having been denounced or whether it shall continue longer by not having been denounced.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the denunciation will come just six months before the 7th of December, 1904, which would be the 7th day of June, Congress might not be in session. In that case you would be left with your treaty gone and your statute gone, and there would have to be an extra session of Congress. You would have to do something within a day or two of the beginning of the session. It would seem to me that these laws should at least continue in force long enough to give Congress time to draw its breath by putting it a little later. I do not know whether I make my point clear to the Senator without restating it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes, I think I understand it. I do not wish to provide that our present laws shall be continued beyond the life of that treaty, because those laws have been passed with reference to the treaty.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose China denounces—to use the phrase that is used—this treaty on the 7th day of June, 1904, where are you? You have not got any treaty, which, perhaps, you do not care so much about, but you have not got any law on the 7th of December, 1904. So if this passes you must have an extra session in midsummer to get a law, or you have got to have the Chinese coming in until you get one after Congress assembles in December, 1904. It seems to me that the slight objection to having the law go over for two weeks after that time does not warrant taking that risk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to state that what has taken place in the last five minutes is the best possible illustration that could be presented of the inadvisability of passing any such amendment as is proposed by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HOAR. I am for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand.

Mr. HOAR. I do not make my criticism in hostility to it, but in aid of it, if I am right; if I am wrong, that is another thing.

Mr. PENROSE. If I may be permitted an inquiry, how could the amendment extend the time beyond the existence of the treaty without grave international complication and a violation of international comity and good faith?

Mr. HOAR. The extension for three or four weeks—

Mr. PENROSE. It seems to me it would be a grave offense.

Mr. HOAR. When we are in doubt whether China will terminate the treaty or not would not be a violation of international comity.

Mr. TELLER. She will terminate it soon enough if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. She will terminate it, I think, if the measure which has been proposed by the committee is adopted.

Mr. TELLER. I will venture to say that she does not.

Mr. HOAR. Senators can think of it over night.

Mr. FORAKER. Evidently whether she will denounce it or not is a matter of speculation in view of what the Senator from Connecticut on one hand and the Senator from Colorado on the other says, but whether the one or the other be right it seems to me that the extension of the law ought to be for the life of the treaty. We will know six months before December 7, 1904, whether the treaty has been denounced by either party to it, and we will know, therefore, six months before whether it is to end in December, 1904, or to continue until December, 1914.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will know that at his home in Ohio, very likely, and nowhere else.

Mr. LODGE. Before that time comes I hope it will also have been found out that not a single law now on the statute book in regard to the Chinese was passed with reference to the treaty. The treaty was made with reference to the law.

Mr. FORAKER. It will be manifest to everybody who examines the laws now on the statute book that the treaty was entirely disregarded when some provisions were incorporated in them.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator misunderstands me. I say that no law on the statute book was passed with reference to the treaty, and it could not have been done, because they were all made before the treaty.

Mr. TELLER. They were made before the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not a single law on the statute book was passed after the treaty of 1894.

Mr. LODGE. Not a law on the statute book was passed with reference to the treaty of 1894.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what I am quite familiar with and what I make reference to. There has been no legislation by Congress under the treaty that was entered into ten years ago.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all; but the phrase was used that the laws referring to the treaty should remain.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. It should be borne in mind that in the treaty of 1894 reference is made to some legislation that had been enacted; and some legislation, which it is claimed is in force, was enacted with reference to a treaty that was pending which was ratified by the Senate, but with amendments which were not concurred in by the Chinese Government, and the treaty, therefore, failed.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That 200 copies of the bill (S. 2900) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent, as amended, be printed for the use of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PETTUS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 11, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTEST—LENTZ AGAINST TOMPKINS.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report of the Elections Committee No. 2 on the election case of Lentz v. Tompkins, from the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING ON CUBAN RECIPROCITY BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday of this week be set aside for pension business, instead of Friday, under the rules, so that the debate on the Cuban reciprocity bill may be continued to-morrow without being broken into by pension business.

Mr. SIMS. Does this refer to the pension business of to-morrow?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand, the request is simply that Saturday be substituted for Friday as the day for pension business under the rule. There is no limitation in the request upon the debate on the pending bill, is there?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; not any.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the debate on this bill should run beyond to-morrow, this request will not interfere with its going on on Saturday.

Mr. PAYNE. My request was simply to substitute Saturday for Friday, so that if the debate on this bill should not be ended to-morrow it will go over until next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS TO CHILDREN UNDER 16 YEARS OF AGE.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to submit a report upon the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9324) construing the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1879, excepting from the limitations named therein the claims to pension by or in behalf of children under 16 years of age.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. May I ask what this business is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill by its title.

The title of the bill was again read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the object of bringing the bill before the House? What is the request in connection with it?

The SPEAKER. It is being reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That is the only object.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Can it not be reported under the rule? Why report it in open House?

The SPEAKER. This is done under the rules. The Chair thinks the committee is privileged for this purpose under the rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is unusual, I think, to report bills of this kind in open House. I do not understand why this bill should not have been reported at the desk, through the box.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in the same category as appropriation bills and river and harbor bills. The committee, under the rule, is entitled to report these general bills in open House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No action upon the bill is asked at this time?

The SPEAKER. Simply reference to the Calendar and printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve points of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order upon the bill just reported.

PENSIONS TO REMARRIED WIDOWS.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 12141) to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to pensions to remarried widows," approved March 3, 1901; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is in this bill. I desire to reserve all points of order against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order against the bill.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report by the direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives whether the State Department has received from official or other sources information as to the reliability of reports which have recently appeared in public prints to the effect that in American territory, near the border of Alaska, British and Canadian officials (exercising authority by an agreement entered into by the Government of the United States and the British Government) are making surveys and encroachments upon territory not included in said agreement, and are removing and destroying ancient landmarks and monuments long ago erected by the Russian Government to mark the Alaskan boundary, and that the Secretary of State be also requested to inform the House of Representatives what steps, if any, the State Department has taken to ascertain the facts as to the alleged fresh encroachments upon American territory and the alleged removal and destruction of landmarks and monuments, and to prevent the same.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "boundary," in line 13.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear, and I would like to ask if this is simply a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. HITT. It is a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State to inform the House as to the reliability of a report published in the newspapers about the removal of landmarks on the Alaskan boundary. The committee has stricken from the resolution the latter part, which was a direction to the Secretary of State to advise the House what steps he has taken to prevent this. It was deemed by the committee, with the assent of the gentleman who introduced the resolution, better not to ask such a question of the Secretary, but to let our Government unquestioned pursue those steps that prudence suggested to secure the interests of our country. I move the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask a question, Mr. Speaker. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. HITT. It is a unanimous report and also has the assent of the gentleman who introduced it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that my colleague introduced it.

Mr. HITT. It was introduced by Mr. COCHRAN, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SHIPMENT OF HORSES, MULES, AND OTHER SUPPLIES TO SEAT OF WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I herewith submit a resolution which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the governor of Louisiana has reported to the State Department the existence and operation in the State of Louisiana of a British base of supplies, conducted and controlled by British military officers, whereby horses and mules and other supplies, contraband of war, are shipped on British military and naval transports to the seat of war in South Africa for the augmentation of the British military forces in South Africa operating against the South African Republics of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal; and

Whereas the governor of Louisiana further reports, and sustains his report by affidavits of American citizens, that the said British base of supplies has been and is being used to procure by solicitation, fraudulent representation, and unlawful means the enlistment of said American citizens in the British army operating in South Africa: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives the said report and communication of the governor of Louisiana, together with all accompanying affidavits, documents, and communications.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

Strike out the preamble.

In line 3, page 1, strike out the words "the said" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any;" and by adding after the word "communications," in line 3, page 2, the words "concerning shipments of horses, mules, and other supplies from Louisiana to the seat of war in South Africa;" so that it will read:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives any report and communication of the governor of Louisiana, together with all accompanying affidavits, documents, and communications concerning shipments of horses, mules, and other supplies from Louisiana to the seat of war in South Africa."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is reported by the committee almost exactly as introduced.

The preamble and the recital therein are omitted. The whole purpose is covered by the resolution. The committee were unanimous in directing its recommendation, and the gentleman who introduced it assented to it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, as the introducer of this resolution, I submit—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HITT. I can not yield. Is it a question?

Mr. SULZER. I just desire to say a word.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to a question.

Mr. SULZER. I only want to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. SULZER. This is a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. HITT. I do not, unless it be for a question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question. What change does the amendment make—

Mr. HITT. I have stated that. I can not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and pending that, I would like to see if some arrangement could not be made about the closing of general debate. Of course we have two days more this week for general debate, and I would like to ask the gentlemen who represent the opposition if we can not close general debate on Monday, so as to take up the bill under the five-minute rule on Tuesday of next week, thus leaving three days, including to-day, for general debate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that general debate close on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate close on Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands a regular order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the contribution that I shall make to the debate upon the pending measure will not be published as a campaign document by the Democratic party. [Laughter.] It will not be used to produce a Democratic majority in the next House of Representatives. It will not be available to aid in securing a repetition of the evil results that have grown to the United States by Democratic successes in past Presidential elections. It will not be used in any of the several Congressional districts of the United States to strike at the merits and standing of Republican members of the House. It will not be available to gratify petty jealousies nor the enviousness of small-sized men in their attacks upon their fellows. My speech will be an attempt, at least, to make plainer to the public of this country the real controversy which we have here; and I shall in my present condition of health deal carefully with my physical strength and try to follow a line of argument that will show how it is and by what road we have traveled to get to the anomalous position in which we find ourselves.

We find ourselves, Mr. Chairman, acting in perfect harmony with the President of the United States and his Cabinet, who are acting as a unit in advocating this measure or some measure of much greater liberality to the people of the island of Cuba. The action of the Ways and Means Committee in bringing this measure into the House and supporting it now with voice and vote is acting in party loyalty and party cooperation. The defeat of this measure will be accepted as a defeat of the Administration and a rebuke to the President. Aye, more than that, as it will be shown, such a defeat would react back to the Administration of McKinley and be accepted everywhere as a repudiation of the diplomacy of our Government under the Administration of the dead leader. Later on I shall refer to facts known to all our people, which it will be seen leaves an inevitable inference that this measure is an effort to make good in a small degree the just expectations of the Cuban people.

We find that the President of the United States, the recognized head of the Republican party, after all the appeals that have been made to him and all the discussions which we have had, adheres firmly and pertinaciously to the proposition laid down and guaranteed to the people of Cuba by the authorities of the United States many months ago. And we find the caucus of the Republican party, or a majority at least of the members of the Republican party of this House, upon a question of pure policy, as I shall show—a matter involving no possible political principle whatever—undertaking to follow the leadership of the President and his Cabinet, and yet antagonized, not upon the Democratic side of this House, but upon the Republican side of the House. The hour is pregnant with momentous results to the future of politics and policies, and I shall, while speaking with the utmost frankness, try to deal justly while recognizing the duty I owe to country first and to party second.

I shall have no criticism of gentlemen who find themselves compelled to break from their party organization and organize a hostile force against the Administration. If gentlemen feel they are bound by conscience or impelled by local self-interest to that course, I shall not complain. I shall attack the motives of no member of this House, and I shall make it none the less easy for any member's reelection by reason of anything that I shall say. Men have the right to choose between their party organization and their conscientious obligation as they understand it, and men have the right to sever their connections with the great onward march of the political party to which they belong and join, if they see fit, a party of mere expediency, based upon some local or special interest. It does not lie in my mouth to assail the motives of gentlemen thus actuated. I will attempt to show that the position occupied by the Ways and Means Committee and the vast majority of this House of Representatives, upon the Republican side, is no deviation nor deflection from the beaten pathway over which we have trodden in our advocacy of protective tariff.

I do not yield to any living man in my devotion to the doctrine of protection, both for revenue and for protection; and I will not permit myself to be disturbed when gentlemen of modern introduction into politics, of doubtful record upon the subject as shown by their own State platforms in other years, come and assail me and attempt to make it appear to the constituents of my district, to the people of the State of Ohio, and to the great Republican protective tariff sentiment of the United States, that I have in some way abandoned the faith of the fathers and am following new lights, borne in the "urns" upon the shoulders of modern reformers who are marching through the wilderness, lighted by the "urns" of self-interest and personal obligations, attempting to overthrow the political history of men who were fighting Republican battles when they were young men, scarcely active in the battles of the great past. [Laughter.] They quote from my written documents and written speeches, and they include with me a number of gentlemen whom I think can afford to stand the criticism—PAYNE, of New York; DALZELL, of Pennsylvania; STEELE, of Indiana; LONG, of Kansas; MCCALL, of Massachusetts; GROSVENOR, of Ohio.

Well, Mr. Chairman, in all kindness, I may say that it would be a great thing if in the flight of years some time shall come when somebody somewhere shall be interested to read what some of these gentlemen have said who have been in public life and who thus criticise their associates. It will be a condition complimentary to these critics if what they say shall be remembered by anybody.

I have some personal record on this tariff issue, Mr. Chairman, and I do not know but what it might be well, in the light of the fact that my district has been flooded with assaults upon me growing out of this unfortunate disagreement in the House of Representatives, that I refer very briefly and modestly to my history so far as the protective system and a generation, in point of time, of earnest support I have given it is concerned.

Immediately following my election to Congress and while some of these gentlemen who now criticise me and my associates were starting out in politics and considering on which side of the protective problem they would align themselves, I found myself under the education of a lifetime arrayed in opposition to the Morrison tariff bill. That was a bill to produce a horizontal cut of the rates of duties upon all articles imported into the United States. Now, it may be well for me to stop here to say that the Republican party has never yet bound itself to stand once, forever, and unalterably in favor of any schedule of any tariff bill. If it had it would certainly be fatal to the consistency of the present position of the gentlemen of the Republican party on the other side of this question.

Let us see what the history of the past upon the tariff question will demonstrate. The Morrill tariff bill was passed before the Republican party came into power as a national organization. It was signed by a Democratic President, and yet in principle it was a Republican measure, Republican in its essence and Republican in its purposes. First, however, to raise revenue, and secondly, to protect the industries of the United States. That bill was changed in 1862 and 1863, and a step forward was made. The Republican party then coming into power when the war was over, the provisions of the Morrill tariff bill were deemed wholly unsatisfactory. First, because some of the schedules were too high, and other schedules were too low. So it was that a tariff commission of Republicans in the majority to revise the tariff was chosen. And out of that came the tariff of 1883, which was a Republican tariff. How would that bill and its schedules look to us to-day?

Would it be very wise to go back along the pathway we have traveled and shoot down as deserters from the Republican party men who voted to revise and reorganize and change the tariff of 1883? We did it under a political commission. We did it because of our own judgment and wisdom, and changed almost every schedule of the then existing tariff. Within my own experience here, when I was a new member, we defeated the Morrison tariff bill. We defeated it in a Democratic House and defeated it by Democratic votes; in part defeated it by the votes, among others, of two Democrats from the State of Ohio. Then came the McKinley tariff bill. On that bill was first placed, so far as Republican action was concerned, this vexed suggestion of reciprocity that now seems to be the signal of danger and fear to some of our friends.

I remember the discussion growing out of that bill. For ten long days we sat here in the Committee of the Whole and the bill was discussed. A great question arose; and, strangely enough, it was, among other things, the sugar tariff which caused the great interest therein. It was the purpose of the Republicans in that body to place sugar on the free list, and we had a sort of battle cry—I always thought it was more or less unworthy—of “a free breakfast table;” and we shook our fists in the faces of the Democrats on the other side and demanded a “free breakfast table.” So it was, however, that we placed sugar on the free list absolutely, making no tariff upon the raw-sugar product of Cuba, but placing a bounty of 2 cents a pound upon the American product of sugar. At that time we were looking forward to the question of the production of beet sugar. We also provided for the free introduction into the United States of machinery for the manufacture of beet sugar. We had made arrangements for the free introduction into the United States of sugar-beet seed.

I cite this fact to show that the sugar-beet industry was then in esse, if not in an assured condition of success. The great question as to the sugar schedule of that day grew out of the difference of opinion between Mr. Blaine, who had been for a long time an advocate of reciprocity, and William McKinley, who was at that early day also a disciple of Blaine reciprocity, but not committed to all the details of Blaine's position. It so happened that I myself heard in the State Department an almost acrimonious discussion between Mr. McKinley and Mr. Blaine upon this question, one side favoring a tariff on sugar, hides, etc., all put into the schedule, and then left competent for the President of the United States, in case of reciprocity, to take the tax off sugar. This was a question of law and administration, and both the great leaders to whom I have referred favored the use of sugar as a basis of reciprocal negotiation. Sugar was then an “infant industry,” and yet these two great champions of protection favored reciprocity in this article.

There has never been an attempt to establish reciprocal trade with any great sugar-raising country that did not involve negotiation looking to the use of sugar as one of the articles to be affected.

The other great leaders of the party at the time took exactly the other view of it, and argued in favor of leaving the duty off or prescribing the amount that should be proclaimed by the President in case reciprocity should fail. And so it was that we ultimately placed sugar on the free list, providing that there was no adequate or sufficient or satisfactory reciprocity granted by the foreign States; then the President of United States might put sugar coming from such country onto the tariff schedule at a rate of duty which we prescribed in the law.

Then we went forward, and reciprocity for the first time found an enduring place upon the statute books of the United States. And reciprocity at that early period of time numbered within the articles that were to be taken possession of and dealt with for reciprocal trade with foreign countries this same vexed article of sugar. Then came the Democratic tariff of 1894, the so-called Wilson bill, which grew out of the defeat of our party in 1890 and 1892, and in that law the Democratic party placed itself in utter hostility to the reciprocity conditions or propositions of the McKinley law and put the tariff on sugar, and we went forward through the disastrous period with which we are all familiar and about which I do not propose now to talk.

Then came the Dingley bill. Now, let me tell gentlemen who undertake to assault members of this House for lack of fidelity to the Dingley law that it would be well for them, before they attempt to sow the seeds of discord in the Republican ranks in this country, before they attempt to aid the Democratic party of this country to secure a majority in the next House, it would be well for some politicians and statesmen to know something about what they are talking about. [Laughter.]

Everybody who had anything to do with making the McKinley law—and there are present in this House no less than seven or eight of the members who all that winter long following the election of McKinley in November sat down day and night and Sundays in the Cochran Hotel and worked on the bill which was to be offered in the spring, and they will all remember that Mr. Dingley and the weight of opinion in that conference was against the high rate of duty that afterwards appeared in the law on raw and refined sugar. But at last, after a long contest, lasting all winter, and after the sugar trust had been heard, and after the beet-sugar men had come here in full force—intelligent men, far-sighted gentlemen—the Dingley bill was passed in the House, providing for a certain reduction upon raw sugar from Cuba and every other country that would enter into reciprocal relations with the people of the United States.

No man who ever lived had a higher regard for his integrity, his wisdom, and his devotion to Republican principles than I had for Nelson Dingley. I esteem it an honor to have been a member of the committee over which he presided, and to have been in the councils of the party when that bill was produced and carried to triumphant results; and I do not know a member here who was cognizant of what was going on but that knows that the enormously high rate of duty placed on sugar, which stands in the law of the United States to-day, was put there for the purpose of reciprocity, and probably with the Island of Cuba.

What happened? The bill went over to the Senate, and our reciprocity provision was mutilated and destroyed in that body. Then came the committee of conference. It is customary in some cases nowadays to refer to private conversations with dead men; it is the most comfortable way to swear oneself occasionally out of a dilemma that I know of. [Laughter.] If you can only find the other person dead, and tell what you said to him and what he said to you, you have got a sure thing that you will never be contradicted. [Laughter.] Sometimes the act is called brave and sometimes it is denominated by a word standing at the other end of the line in the matter of its descriptive meaning. But it is known to the gentlemen who served upon the conference committee on the Dingley bill that Nelson Dingley understood perfectly that the rate of duty upon raw sugar was too high, was unreasonably high, and he voted and steadily voted for its reduction.

But at last came this troublesome question which I will make plain to you in a nutshell. If the duty was to be reduced on raw sugar, then the American Sugar Refining Company, which at that time refined about 90 per cent of the sugar of the United States, would get the benefit of the reduction upon the general tariff line of imports from all the countries of the world. Therefore, while Mr. Dingley felt that the rate of duty was too high—unreasonably high—he was unwilling that it should be reduced unless the differential between the raw and the refined sugar was also reduced. Then came the beet-sugar men—then, I admit, somewhat in their infancy, because they are still an undeveloped industry in this country—and they arrayed themselves against the reduction of the differential.

If we should cut down the duty upon refined sugar it would harm the beet-sugar interest, and if we should cut down the duty on raw sugar, then we should benefit, it was said, the sugar trust, as it was called. So at last, finding ourselves led by Dingley, so far as the House members of the conference were concerned, we voted to retain those provisions—to retain the high duty upon sugar—with the distinct expectation which every member of Congress had at that time that sugar would be one of the prime articles that would be used in the interest of reciprocity.

We now hear talk about a repeal of the differential which exists between the article of raw sugar and the article of refined sugar, and one of the gentlemen who has made himself quite vigorous in his support of the opposition to the plan of the Ways and Means Committee has given notice, as I understand it, that he will distinctly offer a proposal to repeal the rates of duty on refined sugar while maintaining the present high rates of duty on raw sugar. This is to come, as I understand it, from the friends of the beet-sugar industry. The effect would be of course to open our markets to the tremendous product of beet sugar now being produced in Germany, France, and other European countries and assail the present protection that beet sugar has. This is to be done, as I understand it, for the purpose of an attack on the American Sugar Refining Company, and it doubtless would affect that company injuriously to some extent, but while it was doing that it would force the American beet producer into direct and open competition, unaided by Government protection, with all the beet sugar of Europe. If ever there was an industry in the United States that ought to cry out by day and by night "save us from our friends," it is the beet industry of the United States to-day.

Now, go to the debates in that Congress that enacted the bill, and there are many members here who recollect all about it. You will there see that there was a clear understanding that the tariff on sugar was an unnecessarily high tariff, as we now admit that the tariff on a great many other articles is an unnecessarily high tariff.

And right here I deflect from the line of my remarks to say that, devoted as I am to a protective tariff system, long and earnestly and faithfully as I have followed the flag of protection, fully as I have imbibed the teachings of the great fathers of the American principle, and earnestly as I have followed in the footsteps of the men who have been leaders in this House—McKinley and Dingley, and Harrison in the White House, and all the great leaders of the protective-tariff system—I have never yet permitted myself to become the worshiper of the schedules of a protective-tariff system as a fetish that could not be examined, criticised, and revised. And if there is in this House any young Republican who supposes that the shibboleth of his future political career is to be an unswerving demand that the hand of revision shall never touch a schedule of the Dingley tariff bill, that man might just as well go into retirement, for his services to his country will be absolutely valueless in the future.

I quote an extract from a speech which I had the honor to make on the day before yesterday at the convention in my own district in Ohio, which did me the honor to nominate me for Congress for the ninth time. I quote the paragraph from the newspaper report of the convention:

TRUE TO POLICY OF PROTECTION.

It may be said in this connection that no one in the Eleventh Congressional district of Ohio nor any man in the State acting intelligently has the slightest doubt of the stalwartness of General GROSVENOR's support of the true principles and practices of protective tariff. He made use to-day of the following language, which may be somewhat significant:

"Earnestly as I support the doctrine of protection, cordially as I stand by the platform of the party, enthusiastically as I defend the operation and effect of the Dingley tariff bill, I would not be classed among those who worship a statute as a fetish. A protective-tariff law is subject to the fluctuation of conditions, and it must be wisely considered and fearlessly made to adjust itself to the new conditions that are paramount to old prejudices; but when the time comes, and that time has not come yet, when there ought to be modification of the tariff law, the suggestion of wisdom is that the changes shall be made by the friends of protection, and I modestly suggest that no men are better capable of saying when changes shall be made and how they shall be made than are the men who observed the country suffering under the pangs of poverty and industrial depression under the only Democratic Administration since the war, and who emerged with the triumphant column of McKinleyism under the new leader, the venerated and ever to be admired Dingley, out over the Jordan of despair and into the promised land of prosperity and peace and hope in which we are now living."

Commenting upon this speech the following appeared in the Star of this city and reflects fairly the sentiment which I hold in regard to the attitude both of McKinley and Roosevelt:

GENERAL GROSVENOR ON PROTECTION.

The Republicans of the Eleventh Ohio district have renominated General GROSVENOR for Congress. He is an able man, and one of the leaders of his party in the House. His people have been well served by him, and they are wise in desiring to keep him in commission. In addressing the convention which had thus honored him General GROSVENOR said with other things:

The paragraph reproduced in the paper was the same as appears preceding this article.

This is the position that many Republicans take. They will assist in revising the tariff when the proper time comes; but that time, they assert, is not now. Business is booming. Confidence is widespread and well established. If the tariff, even in the slightest degree, is disturbed, conditions will be unsettled and disaster as pronounced as prosperity now is will follow. And so we arrive at that well-known adjuration, "Let well enough alone."

If we follow this reasoning, we must conclude that tariff revision must await dull times, or maybe hard times. But will anybody insist upon that? Would a revision of the tariff, with the schedules already high, and with our years of plenty ascribed to them, be suggested as a remedy for a tight money market and a collapsed trade? It certainly would not be by the friends of high protection. They would take any other ground than that.

But what was the position of Mr. McKinley? He thought eight months ago that the time had already arrived for a revision of the tariff. He was a very sagacious man, and particularly where the tariff was concerned. In his opinion, expressed at Buffalo, our enormous industrial growth and phenomenal prosperity had laid an obligation upon us to adjust our tariff arrangements by reciprocity and a removal of duties no longer needed for protection, to the demands of an expanding trade. He had no fear of an evil effect upon business. On the contrary, he thought that business would be promoted by such a course, and had he lived he would have emphasized his Buffalo argument both by additional words of mouth and by State papers.

But, for that matter, Mr. Roosevelt is of a like opinion. He also holds that reciprocity is necessary to our continued prosperity now, and probably that there are some industries which have prospered beyond the longer need of legitimate protection. Are there better names to conjure with in Republican circles than McKinley and Roosevelt?

From 1862 down to the great contest of 1888, and down through all the days of battle on this floor against the Mills bill, the Morrison bill, and in favor of the McKinley bill—against the Wilson bill and in favor of the Dingley bill—there has been a distinct recognition upon the part of distinguished Republicans that it was proper and competent always and under all circumstances to adjust and readjust the schedules of the tariff to the conditions of the country at the particular time. And he who stands riveted—chained—to a schedule is not the true friend of the protective system.

Why, sir, we did not dare to put into the platform of the Republican party following the defeat of 1890 and 1892 and following the success of Mr. Cleveland—we did not dare to put into our platform that we would reenact the exact schedules of the McKinley law. There is not a gentleman who reads platforms, who participates significantly in any debates upon the hustings of the United States, who will not remember that we distinctly told the people in 1896 that we were not wedded to the schedules of the McKinley law. No man made haste more energetically or more patriotically than did McKinley to tell the people of the United States that it was not a question of schedules, but it was a question of protective principles.

Now, when you are that sort of a man you are an intelligent and valuable Republican protectionist. When you believe that you must adhere to every word, to every dotting of an "i," to every punctuation mark in some bill that was passed under conditions which existed at the time, but may subsequently have changed, and when you say "I will never deviate from one line or one word of that great measure of protective tariff," you have written yourself down a useless member of the House of Representatives and a poor representative of the people at home.

What is it that agitates this country from one end of it to the other? The demand upon us that certain tariff schedules shall be changed. What is my position on that question? I will tell you what it is. I see no special reason why to-day the principles that underlaid the Dingley bill and which were carried into execution in its enactment should be changed or modified in any respect whatever.

I do think that I see the coming time, not far in the future, when there will be an unanswerable demand for changes in some schedules; and I call attention to the fact that the gentlemen who have assailed members of this House, who have attempted in their way to drive other members out of the Republican party, have made haste to point out in printed documents that have been circulated far and wide in this country the reason why there ought to be changes in the schedules of the Dingley tariff law. When the time comes the American people, if they are wise, will remit the question of the revision of the tariff to the Republican party, who will revise it intelligently and along lines based upon the fundamental principles of tariff protection. And there is nothing to-day that threatens the industries of the country so much—there is nothing to-day that is so greatly shaking the foundations of business—as the fact, known throughout the United States, that there is an organization in the House of Representatives prepared, by revolutionary measures, to overthrow the rulings of the Chair and precipitate this country into a great maelstrom of tariff agitation and premature tariff revision. That is what is to-day checking the tide of business.

It is not the Ways and Means Committee that is threatening tariff revision at this time. It is not the majority on the floor of this House that is menacing the country with tariff revision. We are proposing no tariff revision. No fair-minded man will say so. No fair-minded newspaper will say to the people of the country the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives are threatening to enter upon a revision of the Dingley tariff. Times are not ripe for it. When a member of Congress deliberately introduces into Congress a bill to strike at certain specific industries because they are being produced at cheaper rates in this country than they can be produced abroad, he is not acting intelligently and will not stand by his own position, in my judgment. And when a member of the Ways and Means Committee deliberately votes to put on the free list the articles of American manufacture of steel and iron, while leaving the raw material of those products upon the dutiable list, paying high rates of duties, as under the Dingley law, he can not shake his gory locks at me and say that I am violating the principles of protective tariff.

They tell us—and this is a deflection from the line of my argument—they tell us about the farmer of the country. They echo the cry of the gentleman from South Carolina, who struck the tuning fork of the howl that went up from a certain organization in the House of Representatives. He said that we had done nothing for the farmer; that the farmer of the country was being struck at; that that was the only industry the farmer had in his country, and we were striking at it. Why, Mr. Chairman, the fondest dreams that all the farmers of the United States ever had, the most enthusiastic prediction that was ever made by or for the farmers of the United States never pictured or predicted a condition such as they are enjoying to-day at the hands of the Republican legislation of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Exports of a billion dollars last year—a billion dollars! They sometimes talk about a billion-dollar Congress, and a billion-dollar country, but we have got a country that exported of the agricultural products of this country last year a billion dollars into the markets of other countries, and gentlemen stand up here on the floor of the House and say, "Oh, you will destroy all that if you do not hold up the high protection to beet sugar." The cry that Patrick Henry so gloriously described when he defended the American soldier for the misplacing of the beef sinks into utter insignificance as compared with the cry of gentlemen who will stand up on the Republican side of the House of Representatives with full knowledge that the farmers of this country are growing more prosperous and are prosperous beyond all the parallels and dreams that they ever had, and, scanning the figures of an exportation of a billion dollars in a year, then say that we are striking down the only interests that saves the agriculture of the country. God help the agriculture if it is narrowed down to that!

Now, I have shown conclusively, and I challenge contradiction, that sugar has been in Republican estimation, and in Republican enactment, and in Republican discussion understood to be a fit subject of reciprocity. Now, let us see how we came up to this question, and where we are now. I am not one of those who join in the shout in favor of the doctrine that the American people are under some kind of legal or moral obligation to do something that would be unwise or unpatriotic and injurious to any of our interests for the benefit of the people of the island of Cuba. Had I had my way about it from the very beginning I would have prayed that this cup might pass from us. I hesitated, and when the proposition was 50 per cent, declared with some considerable vigor that I would never vote for it. When it sank to the 40 per cent of the gentleman from Kansas, I still refused, and when I understood that the Administration ultimatum was 25 per cent, I said I would not do that if I could do better. Why? I had been a friend of the establishment of this industry of beet sugar. The gentleman need not read that speech of mine any more, unless he is satisfied, as I am, that it would be an improvement upon his own declaration to embody the greater part of it in his utterances. [Laughter.] He need not come to me and say that I have changed front, for there is not one word I ever wrote or spoke, that these gentlemen have been so industriously searching for, that I would not repeat to-day; and that is the real issue that we are contending for on this floor and in this Congress.

I want to refer for a moment to the utter unfairness that has been manifested in the assaults made upon myself, and incidentally but less directly upon the members of the Ways and Means Committee which in the Fifty-sixth Congress made the report which has been constantly read and reread here. The attempt was made to make it appear that the report which I wrote, and which has been so often referred to, was upon a proposition to reduce the tariff on Cuban and Porto Rican sugar. No greater injustice was ever done. No more palpable scheme of deception was ever attempted. The bill or resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], upon which that unfavorable report was written, was a bill to put all the products of sugar, all the ingredients entering into the manufacture of sugar, including molasses and all its ramifications, absolutely upon the free list, and to bring the production of Cuban cane and Porto Rican cane into the United States without any tax whatever, against which I inveighed in that report.

If I were rewriting that report I would not omit one word or syllable from it. It was a report defending the propriety of protection of sugar of the United States and against the building up of the substantial monopoly of the American Sugar Refining Company. What bearing has that upon the question involved here, which is simply and solely the question of whether there is left to the American sugar industry an ample and sufficient protection? I am not going to testify to any of the utterances of dead men, however it came. I will not go beyond the possibility of the vindication of any man by his own declaration of what I may say, but I accept the situation to be about this: We went to war with Spain for the liberation of Cuba. We did not treat Cuba as we have treated any other country on earth. It is not worth while for gentlemen to tell me now at this stage in the proceedings that this is a question of what we will do for a foreign country and that we are under no obligation simply because Cuba is a foreign country. The rule of estoppel applies here. The rule of estoppel, which applies in the business transactions of men's lives, applies as thoroughly and as strongly in the condition now at bar as though it were a lawsuit between two men. Cuba may or may not have invited us to interfere for her liberation. I do not know whether she did or did not. It is a matter of total nonimportance. We did go to war and we went to war because Spain would not surrender her sovereignty over the island of Cuba, and I do not care who produced the war.

There is somewhere in one of the comic operas of the country what purports to be a condition that happens at a battle, or about the time of a battle, between the Russians and the French, and there was a hotel keeper in the neighborhood whose hostelry stood on the disputed ground between the two armies. He had a splendid picture of a French soldier and another one of a Russian Cossack, life size, upon a peculiar sort of signboard which could be turned either way in a moment. As the news comes first from the battlefield that the Russian is gaining ground and is coming the landlord rushes out and turns the crank, and the Cossack makes his appearance. Directly the tide of battle seems tending in the other direction, the exhibition of the Cossack is at once put an end to and the splendid French soldier makes his appearance.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Napoleon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not make any difference who it was; he was a Frenchman. Sometimes as I listen to these speeches and remember the history of 1898 I am reminded of the comic opera of the Black Hussar.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. And the sugar trust set up the drinks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The sugar trust was not in that, my friend. I tell you, if the gentleman ever sees a spook at night, if he is ever out traveling in the nighttime and sees a spook, the gentleman always says, "That is the sugar trust." [Prolonged laughter.] Do not always feel that way. It may not be the sugar trust and may not be harmful. I hope the gentleman will trust to Providence that there are some ghosts beside the ghost of the sugar trust. [Laughter.]

Looking back to the spring of 1898 I am always reminded of the Cossack and the Frenchman. The only difference is that the two signs are a little wider apart; as I remember them, they were not susceptible of being immediately thrown into view. The Cossack would make his appearance in the White House and harangue the President and get kindly words from him and give kindly assurances, and the Frenchman would come down into the committee of the "reconcentrados" and discuss the question of overriding the Speaker of the House and turning topsy-turvy the whole organization of the party and going to war helter-skelter, and the devil take the hindmost—[laughter]—organization to overthrow the action of the House. The President was denounced, and all that sort of thing.

The only difference between the Cossack and the Frenchman of the opera we have with us is that the Cossack and the Frenchman of the opera lasted only through that battle, while our Cossack and Frenchman, the reconcentrado and the Presidential supporter, still live and flourish. We are up to the question; how did we get there and what is the question? While we were still in session here in the Fifty-sixth Congress, all of us hoping that Cuba would so act in the matter of her constitutional convention as to justify the good work that we had done for her, we learned that she finally reached a result that was totally unsatisfactory to the people of the United States, and the Administration refused to consider as a step in the direction of the ultimate relief of Cuba the constitution which she had formed. And a delegation of the constitutional convention came up here, and they were told in unqualified terms that the so-called Platt amendment, which had been agreed to by the House and the Senate, was an ultimatum, and that unless they agreed to that the statu quo would be maintained and they would be held to be a conquered province and not even on the road to independence.

Now, what else happened? I do not know; but I know this, and I will go to the verge of what any gentleman ought to go. I know that after a full conference with the President, with the Secretary of War, and with the Secretary of State and other distinguished gentlemen, both in the legislative and the executive branches of the Government, that delegation went back from their conference with the President to Habana and told the people of Cuba officially and publicly that it was understood and promised by the Administration that in the event they would adopt as a part of their constitution the Platt amendment concessions in the form of reciprocity should be guaranteed to Cuba. This is a part of the written history of those days.

That is what they stated. I am not here to say whether it was true or false, but as a lawyer and as a man of some intelligence, and in view of the fact that that declaration was made—possibly not made while Congress was in session, but made publicly, in the full light of day, and no dissent made to it by the President or by anybody speaking for him—I say that it is fair to presume that that promise was made. In addition to that our representatives in Cuba have undoubtedly given assurance to the same effect. I think that sometimes they have not happened to be as fully intelligent representatives as they might have been, but I think we have reached the point that was fairly stated by the President of the United States yesterday. I wonder, I am amazed, after the tremendous assaults which have been made upon the Administration, that the President yesterday at Charleston should have dared to utter the language that he did last night in the best speech that he ever made in his life. I am glad that when the President believes he is right he stands by it.

Mr. Chairman, I will not stop to read, but I ask unanimous consent that I may publish as part of my remarks certain extracts.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. It may embellish your speech.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have a great deal of my own that I could safely commend to the gentleman from Michigan in the same direction, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire that the request should be submitted at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent to print certain extracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert certain extracts as a part of his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the extracts referred to:

WEST INDIES TO THE FRONT.

You have made a particular effort in your exhibition to get into touch with the West Indies. This is wise. The events of the last four years have shown us that the West Indies and the Isthmus must in the future occupy a far larger place in our national policy than in the past. This is proved by the negotiations for the purchase of the Danish islands, the acquisition of Porto Rico, the preparation for building an isthmian canal, and, finally, by the changed relations which these years have produced between us and Cuba. As a nation we have an especial right to take honest pride in what we have done for Cuba. Our critics abroad and at home have insisted that we never intended to leave the island. But on the 20th of next month Cuba becomes a free republic, and we turn over to the islanders the control of their own government. It would be very difficult to find a parallel in the conduct of any other great State that has occupied such a position as ours. We have kept our word and done our duty, just as an honest individual in private life keeps his word and does his duty.

Be it remembered, moreover, that after our three years' occupation of the island we turn it over to the Cubans in a better condition than it ever has been in all the centuries of Spanish rule. This has a direct bearing upon our own welfare. Cuba is so near to us that we can never be indifferent to misgovernment and disaster within its limits. The mere fact that our administration in the island has minimized the danger from the dreadful scourge of yellow fever, alike to Cuba and to ourselves, is sufficient to emphasize the community of interest between us. But there are other interests which bind us together. Cuba's position makes it necessary that her political relations with us should differ from her political relations with other powers. This fact has been formulated by us and accepted by the Cubans in the Platt amendments. It follows as a corollary that where the Cubans have thus assumed a position of peculiar relationship to our political system they must similarly stand in a peculiar relationship to our economic system.

RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

We have rightfully insisted upon Cuba adopting toward us an attitude differing politically from that she adopts toward any other power; and in return, as a matter of right, we must give to Cuba a different—that is, a better—position economically in her relations with us than we give to other powers. This is the course dictated by sound policy, by a wise and far-sighted view of our own interest, and by the position we have taken during the past four years. We are a wealthy and powerful country dealing with a much weaker one; and the contrast in wealth and strength makes it all the more our duty to deal with Cuba, as we have already dealt with her, in a spirit of large generosity.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, that has brought the question in an acute form to us. It is a question, gentlemen, of a duty that you can not shirk from, and your vote upon the passage of this bill will be a vote of approval of the attitude of the Administration—aye, of the two Administrations—or it will be a vote of open and defiant condemnation. "Choose ye this day whom you will serve. If the Lord be God, serve him; if Baal, serve him."

Now, gentlemen, this question was in just as acute form before the Ways and Means Committee as it is before you gentlemen here. And just exactly what the President deemed to be a true and patriotic policy of the country on this question came up over there as you understand it now; and so the question is this under all circumstances, whether it is just or unjust; and the attitude of the President being thus clearly defined, will we reject the suggestion of the Ways and Means Committee and turn ourselves around to open and aboveboard hostility to the action of the Administration, and thereby start the work of disintegration in every Congressional district in the United States? Gentlemen think, because some of you represent the dominant sentiment, that there is not an underlying sentiment in every Congressional district in this country that the Administration of Roosevelt has been faithful, upright in his purpose of carrying into execution and practice the promises made at Buffalo, and do not get yourselves mixed up with the question that the people of the United States do not take broader views than some personal obligation of a member in a Congressional district may have to a local interest.

Now, I said a long time ago that I would not cast any vote in this House that would, in my judgment, injure any American industry. Nobody need come to me to tell me that the doctrine of the Republican party is that nobody shall lose a day's work. That is exactly what I have been fighting for during all these years. Let us see now if there is any danger. I am going to make my statement in round numbers, for there will be full demonstration made in this debate before it is done with that will substantiate all I say upon that question. I say, first, the tariff on raw sugar, as fixed in the Dingley bill, with the right of reciprocal reduction, is out of all reason, is out of all necessity, away above any demand that is justly made in behalf of that industry. As against the Cuban sugar the tariff is to-day 94 per cent. What do you think of that? Let me tell you. Agitate this question. I know that some of you are filling some of the Congressional districts with statements on this subject. There are 77,000,000 American people, and there are 76,500,000 of them that buy sugar, and there are less than 500,000 of them personally interested in the growth and prosperity of sugar production. And so, if you will make a careful consideration, you will find you have got yourselves allied in interest with a very small minority on the one side and an overwhelming majority on the other side. [Applause.]

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. In the interest of the 76,500,000, do you mean to imply that they would get their sugar cheaper?

Mr. GROSVENOR. We did get it cheaper under Republican policy when we took the tariff all off.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, I am just asking for information for the benefit of the 76,500,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a matter very easily stated. I have sat around here and been hammered over the head for the last six weeks, and I have got some opinion upon this matter myself. I do not believe that the reduction of 20 per cent on sugar production in Cuba will make the smallest possible reduction in the value of the sugar of the United States.

Mr. VANDIVER. I only wanted the gentleman to explain that in the interest of the 76,500,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I do believe the gentlemen that are arguing to the people of the country that we are about to reduce the protection on sugar so as to precipitate 800,000 tons of sugar onto the American market, and thereby destroy the beet-sugar industry, which means, in other words, to lower the price of sugar, I say that those gentlemen are dealing with edged tools that may come home to cut on the other side. That is what I say. It was an unwise act to start this panic. Mr. Oxnard, the greatest promoter of beet-sugar production in the United States, stated frankly and fairly that the beet-sugar industry could stand a reduction of 25 per cent. Had this bill been allowed to pass without opposition or contention, without reconcentrado opposition, and the cry that has gone up to the country, it is my judgment that the beet-sugar industry would never have felt the effects of this reciprocity. As it is, there may be a panic, stockholders may abandon their property, but you will see that there will be a Havemeyer or an Eastern capitalist for every share of stock that doubting stockholders are willing to sacrifice. It is just exactly as bad for their position if it does reduce the price of sugar as though it did not.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman tell us why it will not reduce the price of sugar?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me make my own speech, my friend. [Laughter.] I will give notice now that there will be nobody's speech published in the bowels of my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANDLER. I asked simply for information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I may be able to give it to the gentleman. I have said that the great question of figures, the statistics, and the arguments growing out of the 20 per cent reduction I will waive, because my colleague on the committee [Mr. LONG] will be more fully prepared for that emergency than I am myself. I hope that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Mississippi, for I mean no unfairness to the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER. I was simply asking for information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the gentleman will get it.

Ninety-four per cent tariff on an agricultural product the growth of which is being promoted by improvements and additional and improved facilities every day of our lives. Are we violating any principle of protection by reducing the tariff on sugar 20 per cent? No. And it is then 5 per cent, as I have shown, higher than it was ever intended by the framers of the Dingley law. Why is it not? There has not been a gentleman on the floor of this House—not one—who has been able to demonstrate to his own satisfaction that the reduction of 20 per cent will injure actually—now, I will use the word “actually”—the beet-sugar industry. No man has come here and said that to reduce the sugar tariff on the competitor of beet sugar from 1.70 or thereabouts down to 1.40 or thereabouts did not leave overwhelming protection on that sugar.

I may be allowed, I imagine, to refer to an incident that was a very striking one in the course of the debate here in the conference. A gentleman sitting right up there behind me from one of these beet-sugar States interrupted me to inquire whether this reduction would lower the tariff on sugar so as to make it too low in point of fact or whether sufficient protection would remain. And then he said that which has never been answered by a single advocate of the position on this floor of the opposition to this bill—he frankly said that was the whole question. Railing at members of the House of Representatives because at some time they voted for 1.70 on sugar and now want to cut it down to 1.40—I am using round numbers—and yet refusing absolutely to even say that, in their judgment, the 1.40 a hundred on sugar is not sufficient protection against all the world. I challenge gentlemen to prove it. If you have got an industry that can not stand a protection of that sort of ad valorem or that degree of specific duty, you have an industry that is weaker than, in my judgment, the beet-sugar industry stands to-day. I do not believe that any intelligent man, conversant with the sugar industry, believes that 20 per cent reduction does not leave ample, generous, and sufficient protection. Tell me, somebody who has got the equal of that, what agricultural product has got the equal of 1.38 on a hundred pounds of sugar? Where is it?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Does the gentleman think that the only question involved in this case, as related to the beet-sugar people, is whether or not a reduction of 20 per cent will injure that industry because of a lower tariff affecting the price of sugar?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I recognize that as one of the questions involved, because that has been discussed here.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I remember the incident to which the gentleman refers, when he was interrupted by the member from Wisconsin, and I understood him to say in reply to that interruption that that was the only question—can the beet-sugar industry stand a reduction of 20 per cent?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the only question when gentlemen announce that the reduction is an abandonment of the principles of protection; there is nothing left but that one great question in the case. And my colleague, when he has denounced men here who have grown gray in the service which he has more recently entered as having abandoned the faith of their party, that question may be called up to show that the protection that we leave upon all sugar is not only high but ample and sufficient. Protection does not mean speculative conditions. Protection means a money difference between the cost value in this country of the commodity in competition and the cost value of the commodity imported from a foreign country; and when that protection is adequate and sufficient no man has a right to go to talking about speculative prices and higher protection than is absolutely necessary for the purpose.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I have not seen any ghost and I don't want to make any assault upon the gentleman, but I ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the beet-sugar interests would not suffer, why it is that the State of New York, which the chairman, Mr. PAYNE, represents, pays a bounty for the production of sugar of one-half a cent a pound?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended to finish his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Michigan, in the interest of fair enlightenment of myself or himself, asks me why it is, if there is abundant protection left on beet sugar, that the State of New York gives a bounty of half a cent a pound upon all the beet sugar produced in that State. Now, in the first place, to make that a pertinent inquiry pending a proposed reduction of the tariff here, it would be wise to know whether in the passage of that bill they have been actuated by this threat of reduction or whether it is a bill that was passed a good many years ago. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. PAYNE. It was passed some time ago and amended this year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, then, the next answer—

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. It was passed within two weeks, I am told.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; it is an old law. I know enough about the subject to know that. Nobody who is intelligent is scared on that question; I can tell you that. Before I get through I should like to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] on that matter.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will allow me now, I will say that the law of the State of New York which gave a bounty of one-half a cent per pound on beet sugar was passed several years ago; and I would like to inform my friend from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH], as bearing on this question, that at this very session of the legislature of the State of New York, notwithstanding the pendency of the bill now before Congress, a Republican committee, headed by Senator Raines, reported to the Republican Senate a measure which I doubt not will be adopted, the purpose of which is to reduce the bounty from one-half a cent a pound to one-quarter of a cent. And the committee of which Senator Raines, a Republican is chairman, said that in their judgment the entire bounty was wholly unnecessary. So there you have Republican doctrine on this subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, my friend from Michigan has got the answer, and I commend it to him. But I want to give him another question. Let him tell me why—

Mr. PAYNE. Allow me to say right here that Senator Raines represents the two counties in my district that produce the most beets and in which a beet-sugar factory is located.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, the truth is coming out. People are getting awake to this situation. Why does Germany, with a prosperous condition of her beet industry, pay a great bounty for the production of the sugar-beet product? And why do a number of other countries in Europe do the same? I can tell the gentleman why. It is not to make the industry profitable to the beet-sugar producer, but for the avowed purpose of producing sugar so cheaply as to overwhelm the product in this country and to force their product upon our market at a lower price than we can produce sugar. And that outrage has been abrogated by the action of the Brussels convention.

There you have two answers. In the one case the State of New York does not feel that the bounty is required, and in the other case the foreign country pays the bounty, not to promote a fair profit to the producer, but to place it in the power of the German exporter to overwhelm the American producer.

Now, let me go on. Somebody was discussing here the other day about whether the tariff was paid by the consumer, and he wanted to know what we had to say about that old stale dogma of the free-trade Democracy. Well, I will tell him what we have to say about it. So far as it may concern 150,000,000 pounds, or whatever the amount may be, of sugar-beet product, and so far as it may concern all of the Porto Rico and Hawaiian and Louisiana product, we do not pay that duty. The importer who brings the sugar here pays that duty; but when it comes to the million and a half tons of sugar that we have to import from other countries, the consumer pays the tax. Why, sir, that is the simplest thing in the world. The consumer pays the tax on every pound of tea that has a tax on it, and the consumer pays the tax on every pound of sugar that he is compelled to buy from the foreign country. The gentleman from Michigan made this whole subject absolutely clear in a speech which he made on this floor.

So, then, we say to the American people, “We will tax you $1.38 on every hundred pounds of sugar;” and the people of this country will say to the gentleman, “That is a sufficient and generous protection.” There is not a man here, from those who advocated this question before the Ways and Means Committee and whose testimony is in print down to the point where these gentlemen so eloquently argued in favor of their own local interests yesterday; not one of them has pretended to say that $1.38 a hundred pounds is not ample protection.

Now, what do they say? What they say has truth in it; what they say has force in it; and if it can not be met by some just reply, it ought to have weight with the House of Representatives. They say, "That is all very true; but you promised in your platform, and GROSVENOR made a promise in a report he made to the Ways and Means Committee, and GROSVENOR made a speech in the House of Representatives, and Mr. PAYNE, of New York, and Mr. DALZELL and everybody else made promises; and now what we are afraid of is, not that this $1.38 a hundred pounds is not sufficient protection, but that somebody will be afraid and will not invest his money in this branch of industry."

Well, gentlemen, it is a new argument, it is a new line of operations for the Congress of the United States to be indulging in, that because somebody somewhere wants to go into a nonprotected industry, Congress must in the first place put an unreasonable duty upon the product in order to stimulate the introduction of these gentlemen into the production of this new commodity, but must afterwards see to it that no change of condition shall ever frighten the timid souls who are engaged in the beet industry. I venture to say that there is not one man with money who in good faith ever intended to invest his money in a beet-sugar factory who has been staggered one jot or tittle by the probabilities of the passage or nonpassage of this bill.

Undoubtedly some men will drive hard bargains. Undoubtedly some promoters will strike somebody in New York who will say, "We are going to hesitate; we will not do it until you raise the terms and do better by us." But when there is some beet-sugar factory controlled by an intelligent corporation or individual that has undertaken actually to make preparations to close its business for the year 1902, lest this 20 per cent reduction shall take place, then I will consider the subject, and not until then, and then what shall I say? I will be compelled to say that protection is asked for to an extent that is unjustifiable. If you have an industry that must have such a tremendous protection as that, then your industry is not justifiable, and Congress has no right under the conditions that surround us to refuse to do what is the plain duty of the Congress of the United States. But such is not the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have left unsaid a great many things that I had intended to refer to. We stand upon the brink, as it were, of a proposition fraught with political consequences, none other. Why, I will stop here to say that a few days ago I met a young lady not over 17 years of age, the daughter of a former neighbor of mine, a resident of one of the cities of Michigan, where the beet-sugar industry is largely in operation.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. If she was the product of a beet-sugar country she was a sweet girl.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, she is a sweet girl, let her come from any country.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I inferred that, or you would not have been interested in her.

Mr. GROSVENOR. She was the daughter of an old neighbor of mine, and as soon as she met me she attacked me. They have them all organized up there. She said I was an enemy of the sugar-beet industry, and she went for me nearly as hard as some of these Republicans have been going for me in this House, with a little more good sense and judgment than they have manifested. [Laughter.] Well, I said, "What sort of an industry is that which you have got up there?" Her father is a man of substance, and I found that he probably had an investment in the stock of one of the companies. "Why," she said, "there never was anything like it in the history of Michigan." She said, "They broke up our salt industry, comparatively; the lumber industry failed; but we started this beet industry three or four years ago in the neighborhood where I live, and there is not a mortgage on any farm in that county. Everybody is getting rich. You never saw the like. They are building splendid houses and driving splendid carriages, and now you are trying to take that all away from us." I said, "My dear, sweet little friend, go back to Michigan and tell your people for me, for I seem to have been marked out for execution, that the whole trouble in this case comes of a stampede that may be a damage to that industry that never would have been thought of if your Representatives in Congress had quietly passed the 20 per cent and said nothing about it. In that case you would never have heard that it was passed." I do not know what she will say. I shall steer clear of that locality until I get a more favorable report than I could have gotten from her on that particular occasion to which I have referred.

Now this question must be decided. I predict that it will strengthen the doctrine and the principle and the immutability of the position of the Republican party in favor of a protective tariff. I do not believe that this is a break in the doctrine of protection; and until somebody can show me that this high protective duty is not a protection to American industry, I will not stand silently by and be charged with bad faith to the principles of my party.

I believe that this bill will pass. I believe that the American people stand to-day, 95 per cent of them, in favor of this much concession to the people of the island of Cuba. I do not believe that the people of the United States desire that we shall deal so harshly with Cuba as to force her into the Union of the United States, and I do believe that to adopt an amendment that proposed to demand practically of Cuba that she permit herself to be annexed to the United States is a repudiation of all the promises we ever made to Cuba, and a stultification of patriotism and common sense. When Cuba gets ready to come, we will recognize what the President said at Charleston last night. We will recognize that she stands in a different relation to us from any other foreign country, and we will deal with her to the best interests of the people of that country and to the honor and intelligence of the American people and the glory of the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I know there are those in the House to-day who will think it exceedingly presumptuous for me to attempt to reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and I wish to say at the outset that I am not trying to play the rôle of replying in full to the argument of the gentleman. However, the gentleman gave me the cue to some preliminary observations which I desire to recall for a moment before I proceed.

It is now conceded that the question pending before the House is no longer a party political question. The distinguished gentleman who just criticised some of the younger members of the House in language not altogether sweet and tasteful, acknowledged here that no man was to be criticised for the opinions he might see fit to advance in this debate. And I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that that policy has been clearly and emphatically adopted by the Republican and also by the Democratic side of the House. There is no party line drawn in this discussion. Every man has the right, according to his light and his own conscience, to give expression to his views upon the great question which this House is trying to settle.

I want to say to the distinguished gentleman, and also to the House, that I do not belong to that class of youthful Republicans to whom the gentleman refers. I do not belong to that class of younger statesmen who believe that the schedules of a tariff law are written, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, never to be changed. I believe, too, with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that tariff schedules are to be altered to suit the exigencies of the times, so that there is no dispute upon that question between the gentleman and myself.

Now, when the gentleman first began his address, he took many of us newcomers in the House far back in Republican political history and legislation. I thought at one time that he was about to give us a history of the coon-skin political campaign in Ohio of 1840, but he got this side of that after a while and began with the early history of tariff legislation by Congress and the tariff policy of the Republican party. Now, it was exceedingly interesting as history; but, Mr. Chairman, it lacks interest just at this time. The ancient history of tariff legislation in this House may be curious to the man who has time to sit down and read it over, as a matter of literature merely, but we are dealing with the questions of to-day and of this year, not of ten or twenty years ago. Now, in order that we may not get very far away from our moorings, I wish to read from the Republican platform of 1896 upon this question which we are now talking about. I want to ask you how this resolution would sound if we should go to our next national convention and incorporate it in our platform.

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar growers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

Now, that is a very clear statement of political faith on the side of the tariff for the protection of sugar. As the Good Book says, "The wayfaring man though a fool can read," and understand exactly what was said and what was intended by the national convention of the Republican party at St. Louis in June, 1896.

Four years passed, and in 1900 this same great party met again in convention, and again it spoke upon this question; and I will not stop to read the section of the platform in full, but on the question of protection it was enough for the party to say this:

We renew our faith in the policy of protection to American labor. In that policy our industries have been established, diversified, and maintained.

There were other things said in regard to the protection of labor and industries, but ending up of that section or paragraph of the platform was this:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

There is no misunderstanding that. When the framers of the platform wrote that sentence the Spanish war had been fought and ended. "Conditions," some of my friends in the House assert, "have changed." They had changed. At the time that platform was written these conditions which have so changed things had come upon us and the Republican party met the new situation which had been thrust upon the country.

That, Mr. Chairman, may not be enough, standing alone. Let us see how the Republican party officially interpreted these two platforms in 1900, and how my good friend who sits before me, the eloquent orator from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], and other good friends, many of whom I see before me, who went upon the platform and upon the stump in their Congressional districts—let us see how they read to their Republican constituents. I read from the Republican text-book of 1900. Now, what did we say at that time, and what did our party say on this particular subject? Let us see who is getting away from our anchorage. I read from the text-book:

The farmers of the country have been encouraged by the Republican party in their ambition to produce the sugar of the country.

We had ended the Spanish war and were in possession of Cuba. There was just as much likelihood then that some day Cuba would apply for annexation to this country as there is now. It had been talked of for seventy-five years as not only a possibility but a probability, and we were "up against it" then just as much as we are to-day; and yet what did we say:

The experience of other nations and other parts of the temperate zone has shown that sugar can be produced from beets in great quantities and at very small cost, and can successfully compete with cane sugar under the most favorable circumstances. Under the stimulus given to the beet-sugar production by Republican legislation beet-sugar factories sprang up all over the United States, and the production of beet sugar has already reached large proportions and is increasing with wonderful rapidity.

Now, what did I say about the Republican party giving the farmers protection? When I got on the stump and read that, I called their attention to the declaration of the Republican party. I went further, and read in this official text-book of the party. I do not know who got it up, whether it was Colonel GROSVENOR, Mr. DALZELL, or Mr. PAYNE, or who it was, but somebody, some leader in the Republican party, got up this text-book and put it in my innocent hands [laughter] and led me astray. I read on:

The first thought that came to the minds of the farmers when the events following the war for the liberation of Cuba brought under our control certain tropical areas was whether or not the possession or control of tropical territory by the United States would injure, or perhaps destroy, the opportunities which they believed they had almost within their grasp for supplying the $100,000,000 worth of sugar which the people of the United States annually consume.

That is what we have been talking about here—that hundred million dollars' worth of sugar. Now we proceed to relieve the distressed feelings of our agricultural friends by telling them that having taken that into consideration as our "first thought"—

In other words, it was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear that the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in in a manner which would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production, which the farmers of the United States have, under the fostering care of the Republican party, been building up during the last few years.

I want some gentleman on the other side of this question to tell me how I am going to explain myself to the Republican farmers of my district, having preached this doctrine, put into my hands by great leaders of the Republican party, upon the stump and upon the platform. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, upon these pledges—and I will read some more of them, because they are exceedingly interesting literature—have we been misled. Last night some kind friend sent to my house a card, upon which a lot of statistics were printed, and I have cut out some of them, conceiving that they might be useful to-day.

We have heard about the great leader on the floor of this House—Nelson Dingley. In 1897 he is reported to have said:

I believe that the time has come when the production of our own sugar from the beet ought to be and can be successfully entered upon.

There is another encouragement from a man that the Republicans of my State venerate, whose memory is sweet to the Republicans of Michigan—Nelson Dingley—and they took him at his word.

Then again in 1897 (that is not so very long ago) Congressman PAYNE, who has been quoted before on the floor of the House, said:

We propose to raise beet sugar and cane sugar enough in this country to supply all of our 73,000,000 people. We will not disturb our tariff in the next quarter of a century.

What on earth did he say that for? Why did he put that language into my mouth when I went out before my constituents and said, "The leader of the Republican party on the floor of the House says this tariff schedule shall not be disturbed in a quarter of a century; invest your money; devote your acres to sugar beets. When the great Republican leader, SERENO PAYNE, says, 'We will not disturb that industry by altering the tariff schedule in a quarter of a century,' you may depend upon it."

No; I am not one of those men who believe that tariff schedule is a "fetich to be hugged forever to our bosoms." I do not believe that, but I do believe in standing consistently by such a proposition as that long enough at least for it to get seasoned.

What did the farmers do when these splendid promises were given us in platform, through our leaders in this House, and by the enactment of the Dingley tariff law? Why, availing themselves of the splendid soil and the splendid opportunity, we all put our money into beet-sugar factories. What did we do up in Michigan?

I want to show you something right here about the growth of the beet-sugar industry. In 1890, when the McKinley law was passed, we only manufactured about 2,800 tons of beet sugar in the whole United States. In 1896, when we put forth that first splendid pledge, which I read to you some time ago, the total product of the beet sugar in this country was only 40,000 tons.

Why, it was a dewdrop in the morning when compared with the gross amount of sugar consumed in the country. When we adopted that platform, 40,000 tons of sugar was the total product of the United States. The next year, in 1897, when the Dingley tariff law was enacted, we only produced 41,000 tons, or thereabouts. When these promises were fairly before the people, they began to invest; they built factories all over the United States, and so the splendid progress, as indicated by the red lines on this chart which I show you, in the development of that magnificent industry was made. From 1897, when the Dingley law was passed, when we only produced 40,399 tons as a total product of the country, because of these tempting promises made by the Republican party we went on until, in 1900, we had increased the output of sugar in the United States to about 76,859 tons.

Not only that, but the thing went on. This agitation had not yet arisen, and in 1901 statistics show that we had increased the product of sugar in the United States to 185,000 tons. There is the result of the Republican promises and pledges to the farmers and the capitalists in my State and in California and a few other sections of this country. I hold in my hand a table showing that since the Dingley tariff law went into operation there has been invested in the beet-sugar manufacturing industry in buildings or plants to manufacture sugar $31,977,550. What invited that immense amount of capital into that investment? What induced people to invest their money in that enterprise? It was their confidence in the declarations of the Republican party, which up to this hour I have always declared never broke its promises to the people.

Now that may be used against me, as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio has said, in my district. But I would that he or any other man would go there and attempt to use it. Go into my district; tell the people that I stood up here and opposed the Ways and Means Committee—aye, the President of the United States—in an attempt to change these provisions of a wholesome tariff law, as affecting this industry in my State, in my district, in my city; tell it to them, and I will thank you for it. I have no fears on that score. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I want now to call attention to another thing. Those who have spoken for the other side of this proposition are constantly saying, "Show us that this beet-sugar industry is going to be injured by this reduction of 20 per cent of the Dingley tariff." Here is a table showing that $49,000,000 of capital, waiting investment in this same business, is now held up by the action on the floor of this House.

Is that an injury or is it not? There [pointing to the paper] is the name of the State. There is the name of the city or town where it is proposed to build, by capital now organized and ready for investment, factories to go into the business of manufacturing beet sugar with an investment of $49,000,000. In excuse for my earnestness and the earnestness of my Republican colleagues from Michigan, I want to ask you to look at that table. There is what is waiting in Michigan. More than a third of all that $49,000,000 is waiting in my State.

We have progressed in Michigan in such a marvelous way that it may seem like boasting to stop here and tell you of it. This is why the members from that State are interested in this subject. Our people are interested. We are manufacturing to-day 75 per cent of all the sugar consumed in Michigan. We are manufacturing a third of all the beet sugar produced in the United States.

I wish I had here the pictures that I brought to the Republican conference—not caucus—and put on exhibition one night here—the pictures of a dozen great plants that averaged in their investment $600,000 each. There are the reasons for our earnestness.

There are thirteen such reasons within 80 miles of my house—sugar plants in active operation, and, I was going to say, successful operation. I hope I may say so hereafter. One or two of them have paid a dividend up to the present time. We have just arrived at the point where all these sugar factories might have been a paying and successful investment. But now, with this disastrous measure held over them, it is a very grave question whether any of them will pay dividends.

Now, with these reasons surrounding me and these other reasons which it is proposed to put up in the State of Michigan, I think the man who, representing a district in Michigan, would come here and falter for one instant as to his duty in this matter should never show his face within these four walls again. So much for the sugar interest as I see it and know it.

I have some observations to make now of a general character in regard to this movement—how it came into this House, etc. We all know that during this entire session there has been an intense interest, not only here but everywhere throughout the country, in this question of the reduction of the tariff on Cuban raw sugar. The question came before Congress upon the suggestion of the President in his first message to this body. At once, on the appearance of this message, the people of the whole country took it up and began to discuss it among themselves. The idea among the people seemed to be that this was a question which demanded the consideration of everybody. What did it involve? How did it look to the Republicans, we will say, of my district, who may be considered as representing the average people of the country? How did it look as a question involving an abandonment of the principles of protection to American industry and the opening up of the question of tariff revision.

Now, does anybody think that I am misstating that? It involves an abandonment, in some degree, at least, of the doctrine of protection to an infant American industry. There is no question about that. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] insisted that it was not an abandonment of the doctrine of protection. Well, it was not an entire abandonment. I believe it is claimed by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that it leaves about 57 per cent protection upon the industry after the 20 per cent is taken off.

Let it be conceded that ordinarily a 57 per cent protection is a very large degree of protection, but when you come to apply that to the actual state of facts which exists in my State and in other States in regard to the beet-sugar industry, any man who rides over the roads of my district or State can see at a glance that it is the fear of that reduction, as much as anything else, which paralyzes the prosperity that that business possessed.

You may take any industry in this country that is well protected, and let Congress take up and seriously discuss the question of taking off some of the protection of that industry, is there not a panic there at once? Does not the man whose capital is invested in that industry feel sorry that his money is there? Can you get men to pay their assessments upon stock as readily in an institution well protected which to-morrow is to lose part of that protection? That is the way our people look at it.

The second proposition the people thought they were up against was this: That it is a violation of pledges and platforms of the Republican party of 1896 and 1900. Now, my distinguished and eloquent friend, General GROSVENOR, for whom I entertain great respect always, says his present attitude is not at all inconsistent with those platforms. Well, now, I remember reading in Hudibras, one of the old English classics, of a man who could "by force of argument prove that a man was no horse," and I say that my distinguished and venerable friend makes an idle argument when he attempts to show that we are not, by removing part of the protection upon the beet-sugar industry, violating the pledges which we made to those who followed our advice and invested their money in that industry.

The people also thought that it was a new interpretation of the principle of reciprocity—and I will touch upon that in a moment—but the one thing they thought of as nearest to their interests was that it was an unfair discrimination against a great and growing industry in many States of this Union. Now, take the question of whether this was a new interpretation of the doctrine of reciprocity. To me (a young statesman, as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] would have it) it looks as though it scarcely admits of an argument. Reciprocity has been defined so many times and by such distinguished gentlemen that it seems idle to spend time upon the floor of this House in attempting to give another definition.

McKinley in his last speech at Buffalo defined reciprocity, and what did he say it was? "A sensible trade arrangement between two nations which will not impede our domestic industries." Charles Emory Smith, Postmaster-General at the time, I believe sat by his side, and he later made a speech in which he alluded to this same doctrine of reciprocity. He defined it exactly as the President did—"a sensible commercial agreement for the exchange of commodities, which would not in any way impede or injure our domestic industries." He instanced like this: "Brazil raises coffee and we raise no coffee. We make machinery and Brazil makes no machinery. They want our machinery; we want their coffee. We agree to exchange. That is reciprocity."

So said Charles Emory Smith, I think, in the presence of the President when he made his speech. Afterwards Mr. Smith made another speech along the same line before the Boston Merchants' Association on December 10, in which he said: "Reciprocity does not mean the sacrifice of one industry in order to help another; it does not mean the loss of the greater domestic market in the hope of gaining the less foreign market. President McKinley safeguarded it when at Buffalo he advocated sensible trade arrangements which will not interfere with our home productions. This is the touchstone. With this qualification reciprocity is wise; nay, more, it is practicable; nay, more, it is essential, looking both to progressive public sentiment and to trade requirements of the future."

Now, the "reconcentrado" and the "insurrecto" and the "insurgent" in this House subscribes to that. I am one of the "insurrectos;" I subscribe to that. I also subscribe to what President Roosevelt said very recently in his message to Congress when he gave his idea of what is meant by reciprocity. Here is what he said: "Reciprocity must be treated as the handmaiden of protection." Ah, how often that sweet sentence has been turned over under the tongues of our distinguished leaders in their debate on this question—"reciprocity is the handmaiden of protection." Well, we think so, too, and so did the President, and here is the way he said it:

Our first duty is to see that the protection granted by the tariff in every case where it is needed is maintained, and that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries. Just how far this is must be determined according to the individual case, remembering always that every application of our tariff policy to meet our shifting needs must be conditioned upon the cardinal fact that the duty must never be reduced below the point that will cover the difference between the labor cost here and abroad. The well-being of the wage-worker is the prime consideration of our entire policy of economic legislation.

Subject to this proviso of the proper protection necessary to our industrial well-being at home, the principle of reciprocity must command our hearty support.

Now the "reconcentrado" says "Amen." We subscribe to that doctrine. So we are not "outside the breastworks" on that question. I read a very interesting article a few nights ago in one of the leading magazines of the country on this subject of reciprocity, which I think ought to meet the approbation of us all. This article is from Gunton's Magazine, recognized by all as a leading magazine on economic questions:

RECIPROCITY AGITATION.

Reciprocity, like protection, should be adopted only in the interest of national welfare. It is not in the interest of national prosperity to adopt a policy that shall merely promote the interest of one industry by sacrificing that of another. So far as public policy is used at all, it should be used for the development of all domestic industry, both manufacturing and agricultural. Foreign trade, if it is acquired, should be acquired by the development of perfection and superiority in our domestic industries, so as to overcome foreign competitors by competition, but never by a special bargain that shall sacrifice or injure another domestic industry.

Before the manufacturers of this country give themselves over to the reciprocity movement they had better stop and count the cost, consider the influence, not upon the stove factories or the plow factories, but its influence upon the domestic industries of the whole country. They must remember that if favors are granted to one they must be granted to another and another and another. In fact, one concern has just as much right as another to ask the Government to buy its right of free entry into some foreign market by adding its neighbor to the free list. The only logical outcome, in fairness to them all, would be to put them all on the free list, which would, of course, accomplish the highest ideal of those who are most ardently promoting the reciprocity movement.

Before the people of this country commit themselves to a business-disturbing agitation on this question, in the name of reciprocity, it would be well for Congressmen to pay some attention to our experience in this direction. If the subject were frankly presented as a movement to revise our tariff and pare down our protective policy, there would be little danger from it, because the people would promptly relegate it to the rear. The American people to-day would refuse to consider any such business-threatening proposition as a free-trade or tariff-for-revenue experiment. The term reciprocity, however, is a taking phrase. When it is presented in the interest of American industries to promote our foreign trade, "by reciprocal relations beneficial to both," the subject assumes a plausible seeming. In the hands of the enemies of protection such a propaganda may easily be made a cover for a dangerous innovation into our protective policy, and before we are aware of it deal a mortal blow to our national prosperity.

This article illustrates the fact that the best writers on the subject agree with the "reconcentrado" on this floor that reciprocity is an exchange of commodities differing one from the other, not of the same commodity raised in the two countries to come clashing in competition together.

I desire to make a few remarks upon the question, as I view it, of our moral and legal obligations in this matter. I never believed that the people of the United States were indebted to the people of Cuba.

I always have maintained and still maintain that all the obligation is on the other side. We owe them nothing. They owe us their national existence and their hope of prosperity in the future. If we had not interposed at that critical time in her history and stricken the shackles from her limbs which Spain had fastened there, where would have been her prosperity to-day? And because our generous and whole-souled people did that at the expense of millions of dollars and hundreds of lives, ergo, say some of our distinguished leaders, we ran ourselves into a load of debt. I supposed when an act of that kind was done the indebtedness ran the other way, and that the obligation was upon the party that had received the benefit and not the party that conferred it.

So that I repudiate the idea that we are under any obligations. Why, I have a mind to refer to the fact that by and by there is going to come before this House a bill to provide for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West. That bill is going to be pressed by gentlemen upon the floor of this House who tell us that our great moral obligation to Cuba demands of us that we shall put this legislation upon our statute books.

Suppose we should turn upon those advocating that bill and say, "Our great moral and legal obligation to the Piutes, the Navahos, and the tarantulas, and the rest of them out on those desert lands is so great that we can not fail to recognize the fact that when we civilized those people, when we attempted to give them an education and did all those things for them we owe them something, and we can not take from them their beloved desert of rock and sand but leave them to enjoy their happy homes just as God gave it to them." Suppose we should meet the presentation of that bill with an argument of that kind. We are under just about as deep obligation to Cuba in respect to what we have done in her behalf as we are to the Navahos and the tarantulas (big spiders) out there in the arid lands.

Now, I want to speak of another thing just for a moment. Where, under the broad canopy of the sky, arises our moral and legal obligation to Cuba? "Oh," said the very distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], "I will go as far as any gentleman can in telling what a dead man has said," or something of that kind, and proceeded to tell us about that impecunious delegation that came up here from Cuba, and went to the White House to ask the President to give Cuba six or eight million dollars by way of reduction of the tariff.

President McKinley was one of those happy dispositioned men who never let a visitor go out of his presence without feeling that he had grown an inch taller while he was talking with him; and these impecunious Cubans, who came with outstretched hand of beggary, nothing else, caught the idea because the President was so gracious and kind that they had obtained his promise. They went back and they exaggerated and misrepresented the matter and told the Cuban people that President McKinley had promised them that he would do so and so.

Now, think of that for one moment. President McKinley could make no promise. He could not arrogate to himself the powers of this Congress and say to those Cuban emissaries, "I will do so and so, or I will see it done for you." He had no authority to make such a promise, and if those Cubans had known anything about the structure of our Government and the powers of the different departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the Government—they would have known that President McKinley not only did not but could not make any such promise to them.

Now, upon such a light foundation as that this whole structure of moral and legal obligation is built up and advocated by dignified, learned, and great statesmen on the floor of this House. I may be young in the House, but I have had some years in the business of the law, and other places. I think I know better than that; and he must be a statesman "yet moist behind his ears," to quote my distinguished friend from Ohio, who will accept such a foundation as that for a contract of this great nation to do what they are urged to do to-day for Cuba.

One other point that I desire, Mr. Chairman to call to the attention of this House, and that is this: The exceedingly weak foundation on which is built the demand upon this House. Upon what does the President place his policy. Why, his recommendation reads, it is based upon—

"weighty reasons of morality, of national interest" why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom, indeed to the vital need of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States.

Then the Secretary of War, for whom I entertain as great respect as any man in this House; what is the foundation he places it upon? He makes his recommendation upon the proposition that "the chief hopes of future prosperity of Cuba are to be found in its commercial relations with the United States, and the prosperity of Cuba depends upon her finding a market for her products—sugar and tobacco—at a reasonable profit in this country."

The military governor of Cuba bases his suggestion on the statement that it was "the great desire of Cuba to obtain such a reduction on her imports into this country." They are all the time talking about the Cubans. The President-elect of Cuba put forward his recommendations on the ground that "the prosperity of Cuba depends upon the attitude of the United States toward the new republic and the moral obligation of this country toward Cuba."

Thereupon a great clamor was heard, the beating of tom-toms and Chinese drums in the newspaper centers. The newspapers began to demand that we should "make laws for the benefit of Cuba." Now, do you not remember reading it, that "we must make laws for the benefit of Cuba?" And right here I want to say that I deny the power of this Congress to make laws for the benefit of any people except the American people. We are not sent here to make laws for the benefit of the people of Timbuktu, or Cuba, or any other people, except our own possessions, our own people, and our own countrymen.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Do you think that the Republicans were sent here to make laws in direct opposition to the wishes of the President of the United States?

Mr. WEEKS. The President has no more right to tell this Congress what laws shall pass than I would have to go down and tell him who he is to make a member of his Cabinet. That is a straight answer.

Now, I consider the most lamentable part of what I have read to be this: That while the President and Secretary of War and Governor Wood and the president of the Cuban Republic—who has not been on the island for twenty-five years and who has not started for the island yet—all place the obligation of the United States solely upon what the Cubans desire and the Cubans wish, and what is necessary for the Cuban people and their prosperity, but not one word as to what the people of my State and the people in California and Washington and Illinois want in the premises. They seem to have forgotten, one and all, that there is somebody else interested in this thing besides the Cubans.

I spoke a moment ago about the clamor set up by the newspapers. There is nothing new in that sort of thing in the history of American politics. You remember the clamor that we had at the time the Porto Rican tariff bill was before us.

There has been an immense deluge of pamphlets showered upon Congress and upon the people of this country, demanding of us to "do our duty toward Cuba."

Back on the quiet farms of Michigan and Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and far-off Washington and California, the plain American farmer was reading this literature, these campaign pamphlets that has showered and deluged us, and that were being hurled and rained upon us, and he was asking, "Who puts up the money to pay for this expensive business?" for it must have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. Did the poor Cuban pay it? Where did the money come from?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEEKS. I will only occupy a moment or two more. I have got much to say, but I do not wish to exceed my time to any great extent. I was asking whom do you think put up the money to pay for that expensive pamphleteering and pictorial campaign? I had the curiosity to send up to New York to get quotations of the sugar stock in the New York Exchange, and I found that from the 2d day of January to the 3d day of April the stock of the sugar trust had been gradually rising in that market from 117 to 132½, and is higher than that within the last few days.

Every day that there appeared to be a prospect in this House that the opponents to this bill might succeed the stock went down a point or two, and the next day it went up again, and has been going up; and an expert has made the calculation upon the stock for me and tells me that there has been over $600,000 profit made upon speculation in that stock because of the agitation in this House and because of the expectation that the sugar trust is going to be the beneficiary of this whole business.

Before I forget it, and in closing, I want to suggest another thing, that the difference of opinion which exists among Republicans on the floor of this House is not such a difference of opinion as will separate us from our leaders hereafter. This is not a political question. It is not a party question. The conference left all of us Republicans to our own consciences, whether we would support this bill or not. The Democrats have done the same, and we stand here each man on his own responsibility to his conscience and his constituents, and no one else.

Now, this difference is due to the fact that some of us claim that this measure will injure the beet-sugar industry, while others claim that it will not. That is all there is to it. I have attempted to show you that the beet-sugar industry is suffering to-day, and I could give you individual instances. I could tell you that in my own city one of these great factories is attempting to negotiate a loan upon its bonds for a working capital, having completed a plant costing $600,000, and that the capitalists who stood ready to furnish the money before this agitation began have withdrawn from the negotiation and refuse to advance the money. Does that injure the town? Does that injure the factory? Does that not embarrass my constituents? If it does not, I don't know anything about that kind of business.

The Ways and Means Committee contend that 20 per cent reduction affords ample protection to the beet-sugar industry. They claim there is 57 per cent protection with the 20 per cent taken off. Suppose it is so, you can not reduce a tariff which protects an industry which is just in the act of completing its factories, as the industry in my town is—just putting the cap, as you might say, on the smokestack and not do it injury.

This Congress says: "You are too much protected; you put your $600,000 into this factory on the faith of what we had placed upon the statute book; you put this great pile of stone and frames of iron up, and this immense and beautiful chimney, an ornament to the city; you built that on the faith of what we had placed on the statute book, but we are going to knock it down." And you gentlemen tell me that this does not injure an industry in my town. No matter what my friends in this House may think or say on this subject, it is my firm belief that any reduction of the tariff on sugar will operate to the disadvantage of the beet-sugar industry, and, so believing, I am constrained to vote against this measure.

Now, I ask any man on the floor of this House, whatever his attitude may be on this question, Do you believe that this legislation is going to help the beet-sugar industry? It is not a neutral thing; it injures or helps—one or the other. It is a more or less violent change in existing law affecting a new industry. It will either hurt it or it will help it. Which do you think it will do? I think it will hurt it. You may talk about the "differentials," and the "kaleidoscope," and the "polariscope," and all these other scientific instruments and things, and the "percentage," and the "Dutch standard," but you never can make me believe that this legislation will simply allow everything to remain in statu quo.

It is going to hurt it or it is going to do it good. Which do you think it will do? I am not able to weigh or measure the amount or degree of injury it will do; I do not seek to. I do not reduce that injury to a question of ounces or dollars, but I know it is going to be an injury. But, Mr. Chairman, I object to it largely because it is an unjust discrimination against one industry. I said a while ago that I was not one of those who believed that the tariff schedule was to endure forever. I do not believe the sugar schedule will endure forever. Some day there will come a change, but not now. You never could make an attack upon the beet-sugar industry at so critical an hour in its existence as right now, and now is the time you propose this legislation.

Those who oppose this legislation are willing and anxious to have their attitude fully published and made known. With that end in view, I take the liberty here to state the principle laid down in the Republican conference as a basis of our action, which was as follows:

We oppose the proposition to reduce the tariff on Cuban products coming into this country because it involves a relaxation of the protective principle. The Republican platform of 1896 condemned the Democratic party for not keeping faith with the American sugar growers; we seek not to merit for ourselves the same condemnation.

The proposition to reduce the sugar tariff is unwise and unjust, because—
1. It constitutes, in essence, an abandonment of the protective principle, even though it removes only one-fifth of the duty imposed by the Dingley law. And this abandonment is most unhappy because applied to the pursuit of agriculture in the most conspicuous instance in which specific and manifest protection is given to the farmer, and at the moment when the beet industry is not only in its infancy, but in an infancy so lusty and promising as to demonstrate the certainty of a rapid and prodigious growth. The beet-sugar industry exhibits in the most perfect form we have yet known the most approved principles of protection.

Heretofore the farmer has been compelled to find his justification of protection, from the standpoint of personal interest, in the prosperity reflected from the industrial artisan, and in the main he has, through good report and evil, been bravely loyal.

Since our platform of 1896 gave a party's guaranty of permanence the people took us at our word, and we have demonstrated that in the beet-sugar industry we could more vividly than in any other enterprise illustrate to the American farmer on his own broad acres the beneficence of the American system of protection.

The American market for over $100,000,000 worth of sugar annually is rightfully his. We shall encourage no policy which delays the time when he shall come into his own.

2. As to the fancied duty to Cuba because of a distress which is only apparent in the admitted fact that every man on the island has all the work he can do at higher wages than he ever before received, we have only to say that the low price of sugar is a mere business condition of temporary character, and that to compromise with it on the terms proposed is, in its interference with the policy of protection, to pay too high a price for all the good that can possibly come to those whom it is intended to benefit.

The proposition is to undertake to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in Cuba, a foreign country and a foreign government. If we undertake it, when and where are we to stop?

It is a startling proposition entirely outside of our governmental functions and our constitutional power.

Whenever we have undertaken to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in the United States, our own country, by means of a protective tariff, we have been bitterly assailed on the ground of paternalism.

Now, at the expense of our own labor, our own capital, and our own industry, and largely at the expense of a single industry, without reducing the cost of sugar to the American consumer, we are asked to extend the paternal hand to a foreign people on the ground that, having given them liberty, we are morally obligated to secure them commercial and industrial prosperity, even at the sacrifice of our own interests.

We emphatically deny that we are under any such obligation, morally or otherwise.

We insist that such an undertaking subjects the Congress of the United States to the charge of being false to its constitutional obligations, untrue to the people it represents, and, from a political standpoint, false to the pledges made by the party to the people when it asked and received their support.

3. Entirely independent of its effect on the beet-sugar industry as a present fact in established concerns, it would smother the further development of the industry through the scores of plants now in various stages of active advancement.

An industry which has grown fivefold in the last four years, and doubled since 1900, has in it the certainty of a future development so stupendous as to beggar prophecy and appeal with cogent force to our national pride.

4. In so far as the proposition professes to be in the line of Republican reciprocity, we assert that it is essentially a denial of that great policy. We deny that reciprocity is desirable except as a corollary to the greater policy of protection. Republican reciprocity, wise reciprocity, does not seek an exchange of products at the expense of any American industry; it does not seek to give, it does not give, commercial advantage to any foreign product which comes into competition with our own products; it does not seek an exchange of products which deprives any American artisan of his work or any American farmer of an opportunity to profitably till the soil.

This was explicitly declared by McKinley in his Buffalo speech in the following words:

"By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus."

And by President Roosevelt in his annual message in these words:

"And that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries."

5. To say that the duty on sugar is to be lowered on the plea that it helps Cuba is to say that it must always be lowered when Cuba needs help; and a reduction of one-fifth by the House of Representatives means that elsewhere, both in and out of Congress, the extent of that reduction shall be measured by the varying views of those who consider it.

It must, therefore, follow that the protective principle is to be subordinated to the question as to what amount of help Cuba may need.

With such a policy declared by a Republican majority, what wise business man can be induced to invest his money in the beet-sugar industry? What promise will there be of its future development?

And if that Republican majority is once constrained to such a policy, what license have we to believe that the citadel of protection will not be further assaulted in the house of its friends? When that time comes the days of Republican supremacy will be numbered.

Never more earnestly than at this hour have we been summoned to our duty; never has the cause of protection—to which we owe our party success and our national prosperity—more needed our undivided and unflinching support.

We pledged our faith in 1896 to the sugar growers of the country, and they took us at our word; in 1897 we kept the faith and passed the Dingley law, and the people, relying on that law and our party pride and traditions, proceeded to develop in amazing proportions the industry which we specifically encouraged them to enter.

We are told that the pending proposition will not hurt the beet-sugar producers; but surely no one anywhere has asserted that it would help them.

A tariff measure which has the unanimous indorsement of free traders is not above suspicion, and a search warrant will not be needed to find all the protection that is hidden away in it.

I submit to the country that the foregoing is a candid and forceful statement of sound Republican principles. Upon it we of the opposition go to our constituents, confident that no flaw can be found in our armor.

I will not occupy further time. I simply want to brush aside for a moment the curtain that time has let fall between the past and the present, in order to call your attention to a scene that took place during the civil war. It was at the battle of Chickamauga. There had been an awful conflict. The thunders of war had raged there for three days.

Rosecrans, the leader, with the bulk of his army, had sought shelter behind the rifle pits and the earthworks of Chattanooga. All was disorder, disaster, and defeat. At length, out of the smoke and dust—away out in front—there came a message, signed "George H. Thomas," saying, "I am here as firm as a rock." The instant that message was read order came out of chaos; victory came out of defeat. The Union Army was saved from destruction and the flag saved from disgrace.

Now, I want to say to my exceedingly good friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and my other exceedingly good friend and leader from New York [Mr. PAYNE], here we stand as firm as a rock, with the flag of protection floating over us, ready to do battle with you in the cause of Republican principles. In that cause we will gladly follow you in the future as we have in the past; but when you ask us to repudiate a principle of the great Republican party and turn against the industries of our own people, there we refuse to follow. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the convincing arguments already made in favor of the bill "to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba," I do not propose to speak at length; I am, however, desirous of expressing briefly my approval of the pending measure. I shall give it my support for the reason, above all others, that we are under a moral obligation to the people of Cuba to grant the relief proposed by this legislation.

We declared war with Spain for the purpose of banishing inhuman rule from the island of Cuba. We have claimed that no war was ever entered upon with purer purpose, and I believe history will justify the claim. The sacrifices we have made in behalf of Cuba have not been small. Brave men risked their lives that Cuba might be free. We owe it to them to see to it that Cuba starts out as a free and independent state with well-founded hope of success.

In declaring war we disclaimed "any intention to exercise sovereignty or control over the island of Cuba except for the pacification thereof," and we promised when that was accomplished "to leave the government and control of the island to its people." Since the close of that war we have been endeavoring to establish a stable and independent government. Leonard Wood was appointed military governor of the island. No better appointment could have been made. His administration has been satisfactory to the people of this country and of Cuba. In the conduct of his high office he has reflected honor upon his Government and has done very much to make the establishment of a stable government possible. His patriotic service has furnished proof to the world that our efforts have not been based upon a selfish motive.

Now that he has practically finished his work and our pledge to leave the government and control of the island to its people is about to be fulfilled, his statements are entitled to receive from his countrymen and from us as their representatives full and favorable consideration. What is it that he has to say about the need of Cuba and our duty with reference to it?

He tells us that while we have expelled Spain, have cleaned up the island and laid the foundation for good government, that our work will be largely useless unless Cuba has the means to continue the work; that Cuba, hardly out of the ruin caused by the war, is obliged to compete with the bounty-fed sugars of Europe and the highly protected sugars of the United States, and that if we leave her under the present tariff conditions we do so knowing that it is highly probable she will not be able to maintain such a government as we have declared she shall establish and maintain. He puts the matter very eloquently and very forcibly before the American people in these words:

Her people have exhausted their resources in a heroic struggle to build up their industries, but they can not go on spending more than they receive any longer. This year's sugar crop, which will be over 800,000 tons, represents their supreme effort, and unless relief comes—and comes quickly—we must expect a crisis which will render Cuba's position most deplorable and ours most embarrassing. We have assumed the responsibility of establishing her as an independent stable government, and we are in honor bound to see to it that she is given a reasonable chance to maintain such government.

In the face of such a statement from such a source I do not propose to doubt for a moment the fact that distressing conditions exist and that it is our duty to act promptly. The appeal is honest and frank and manly. Let us meet it in the same spirit, in the way I believe the people would have us. I accept Governor Wood's statement of conditions in Cuba as absolutely correct. I know of no man in public life whose words with reference to this subject should be so convincing.

I believe, then, as I said at the beginning, that we are under a moral obligation to grant the relief for which he asks. The pending bill grants a reduction of 20 per cent of our tariff rates upon articles imported from Cuba until the 1st day of December, 1903. It is not a large concession. It is the very least we can do. We owe such action to the Cuban people, and in taking it we are but carrying out the spirit and purpose of the pledges we have solemnly made.

But the present bill is not simply a reduction of tariff rates upon articles imported from Cuba. It is a reciprocal arrangement. Cuba proposes to give us a substantial return. It is not charity which is asked, but an honest, equitable agreement which will be for the benefit of both the contracting parties. We shall increase thereby the foreign market for American products. During the year 1901 Cuba imported from countries other than the United States goods valued at over $38,000,000. By far the greater part of these imports should come from the United States. With Cuba independent and prosperous its market will be of great value to us. And then, too, by the terms of the bill Cuba must adopt immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws as restrictive as the laws of the United States. This check upon the immigration of cheap labor can not fail to be of benefit to our own producers.

It has been urged that the Cuban producers (whom we are seeking to aid) would not receive the benefit of the proposed reduction in duties, as so large a proportion of this year's crop had already been sold. Investigation does not justify this inference, reports from official sources showing that an insignificant amount has been disposed of. It has also been claimed that the proposed concessions can not be made without serious injury to American industry, and especially to the beet-sugar industry. We certainly desire to carry out our obligations to Cuba without injury to any American industry.

It is claimed by the framers of the bill that while the Government may lose seven or eight million dollars of revenue, as a matter of fact none of our industries will be injured. It seems to me that this claim is justified by facts. We consumed last year about 2,300,000 tons of sugar, and it is estimated that our consumption during the current year will be about 2,500,000 tons. The entire production in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the United States is about 850,000 tons. If Cuba's crop amounts to 850,000 tons, as estimated, we shall be compelled to import from other countries about 800,000 tons. The proposed tariff reduction can not, therefore, reduce the price to the consumer. If Cuba's entire crop is sold in the United States, we must still buy elsewhere about 800,000 tons—a statement of fact which ought to satisfy one that the slight reduction proposed for so limited a period can not injure in any measure the beet-sugar interests of the United States.

In his message to Congress, at the beginning of the present session, President Roosevelt urged the enactment of some measure for the relief of Cuba. Over four months have passed since then, and time has served to justify the wisdom and justice of his appeal. In his message he said:

Elsewhere I have discussed the question of reciprocity. In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of national interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I most earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom—indeed, to the vital need—of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duties on Cuban imports into the United States. Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desire—that she should stand in international matters in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power; and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being.

In this recommendation the President is most heartily indorsed by the Secretary of War, who says that the same considerations which led to the war with Spain now require that a commercial arrangement be made under which Cuba can live.

I regret that this bill could not have been brought before Congress at an earlier date. Prompt action was demanded in the interest of both Cuban and American. Now that the matter is before us I trust there may be no further vexatious delay, but that the bill may soon become law.

By the provisions of the so-called Platt amendment the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power which will tend to impair its independence; it shall not contract any public debt for the ultimate discharge of which the ordinary revenues of the island shall be inadequate; it shall permit the United States to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty; and it shall sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations.

By our own action we have made it necessary that Cuba should stand in closer relations with us than with any other power. She must look to us, and to us alone, for such a commercial union as will give her that prosperity necessary for the maintenance of an independent government.

Another most important provision of the Platt amendment is the one which compels the government to execute plans for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the commerce of the Southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein.

It is of the most vital importance to our own people that this provision should be carried out. A bankrupt government can not carry it out. Were we actuated by self-interest alone, we should make this reciprocal agreement under which Cuba can live.

If Governor Wood's evidence is not deemed sufficient, the testimony given before the Committee on Ways and Means, which considered the question at great length, ought to be convincing upon the point that a failure on our part to grant some concessions will result in great financial distress.

The reason why there is at present no such financial distress and that labor has been fully employed at fair wages is found in the fact that the producers of Cuba have relied upon reasonable, if not generous, concessions on the part of the United States. The planters are heavily in debt. If their sugar must be disposed of under present conditions, it must be sold at a price less than the cost of production. Failures will inevitably result.

The situation is serious for the Cuban people. In view of the far-reaching consequences which may follow, it is also serious for ourselves. Should bankruptcy and demoralization follow their establishment of an independent government the United States would be compelled to intervene again, and immediate annexation would be likely to be the result, a result which, for one, I do not desire.

The making of this commercial arrangement is in accord with the principles of the Republican party. It is a reciprocal agreement, and not a revision of the tariff or an attack upon our protective system. The desirability of supplementing our tariff system with reciprocity has of late been urged with great force. The need of wider markets is acknowledged by all. The home market is no longer sufficient.

During the coming years the growth of our export trade with Cuba will undoubtedly be very great, and the action we are now proposing to take will not only give the aid so much needed, but will ultimately be of great benefit to our own producers. I am glad of the opportunity by my vote to place myself in accord with the President, the Secretary of War, and General Wood. I believe the outcome will be for the good of Cuba and the United States. It is not legislation based upon sentimentalism, but upon that sense of justice and right which has ever been characteristic of the American people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, my position is quite embarrassing. Very distinguished members of this House have shown the errors in this bill in orations which were noticeable equally for their eloquence and for their length. It can not be expected that in the brief ten minutes allotted to me, a most undistinguished member of this House, I could show the errors of their argument; but I must say that although I have listened with close attention, I have been unable to comprehend or even to guess why such fervor should be shown in the opposition to this bill. It does seem to me, with very great respect to the distinguished gentleman who has so eloquently opposed it, that there is an immense amount of cry to an amazingly small supply of wool. Almost everyone agrees that whatever happens with the money taken out of the Treasury, the price of sugar as it is sold in the American market will not be affected.

Some gentlemen on the other side have asked of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE] and others, "Do you think the price of retail sugar will be affected or diminished?" and the answer has been no, as of course anyone can see must be the case. Now, what results? Some of the gentlemen think that the $6,000,000 taken from the Treasury will be absorbed by the octopus that goes by the name of the sugar trust, and some of them hope that the $6,000,000 may go into the pockets of the Cuban planters; but, Mr. Chairman, whether it goes to Mr. Havemeyer or whether it goes to some toiling Cuban, or no matter where it goes, if the retail price of sugar in the United States remains unaffected, as it must remain unaffected, for all commercial laws show that such a reduction as this must leave it unaffected, then I confess I can not understand why and how the beet-sugar man who sells his sugar, who is interested in but one thing in the world, and that is the price of retail sugar in the United States, is going to be affected by this legislation. It may be my lack of intelligence, but it is for that reason that all these eloquent remarks about the untimely demise of an infant industry have fallen very coldly upon my ear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one thing more in my brief ten minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] said that there was a question of obligation due to Cuba. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that what is back of the demand for this legislation is the obligation which the people of the United States owe to themselves. Why is it that the Administration is in favor of this legislation? Why is it that the great mass of the people of the United States are back of the Administration in favor of this legislation? It can be stated, Mr. Chairman, in a very few words. Four years ago we undertook a war with Spain. We were not bound to do it. We are not bound to go to war in behalf of every poor and suffering people. We were not bound to enter upon a career of national knight errantry in behalf of Cuba or in behalf of any land or island. But we did it. Let us remember how loudly it was stated upon the floor of this House, how loudly it was stated all over the United States, that the people of the United States had undertaken an unselfish war, that they were willing to spend their blood and treasure for the good of others.

How often has it been stated, on this floor and off this floor, that as a result of the war, not merely the success gained in it, but the motives which led to its being waged, the position of the United States has been raised all over the world. Now, Mr. Chairman, I presume that is so; but having assumed that philanthropic rôle, we must live up to it. The proverb says that nobility imposes its obligations. To take a parallel case that was suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, let us suppose some poor waif oppressed by a cruel guardian. Any man has the right to say that he will not bother his head about that waif. He has the right to say that his time is taken with his own family and his money is absorbed in his own household; but if instead of that he says, and says quite loudly, with some assertion of virtue, that he is going to rescue that ward from the cruel guardian and make it a lot a happy one, and if he begins that laudable enterprise, if he interferes and gets it out of the charge and hands of the guardian, and the next morning changes his mind and buttons up his pocket and says if the ward is going hungry for breakfast that that is no business of his, those who would not have said one word if he had left the child alone will declare he is behaving in a shabby manner.

The situation is the same with Cuba. We have interfered where we were not bound to interfere. We have declared that we acted for the benefit of others without any personal consideration. What will be said if at the very eve of that, the very first time that a question comes up in the American Congress which presses on the pocket of some large financial interest, we turn around and say we will do nothing? Gentlemen of the House have said: "Under what obligations are we to Cuba? Why should we interfere to relieve Cuban planters?" The time to say that, Mr. Chairman, was before the war was begun and not now. And that is why the people of the United States are back of this demand. They know the thing most important. The thing they care most for is the reputation of the country as a great and honorable and liberal nation.

The masses of the people are not disturbed, as are gentlemen here, by any question as to the future price of sugar or differential rates. They believe that there are things more important to a nation than its beets. They know that it is true in the past and will be true forever that "righteousness exalteth a nation." They demand that, instead of considering whether $6,000,000 will come out of the Treasury or one-half of 1 cent per pound goes off the price of beet sugar, the Congress of the United States shall do the thing which will be consistent with the past record of the country, which will honor the land in the esteem of other nations and of posterity. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the Congress of the United States, on such a question as this, will not fall below the patriotic self-respect of the people whom they represent. [Loud applause.]

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss at any length the bill before the committee. I think the bill gives altogether too small a concession to Cuba, and unless some one else precedes me in making the motion at the proper time, I shall move that the amount be increased from 20 per cent to 33½ per cent. I think if you fix it at 20 per cent it is entirely inadequate to the necessities of the Cuban people and will afford them but little practical relief, and if increased to 33½ per cent, the general impression is that it will relieve them at least temporarily, and an increase to that amount can be made without any detriment to the beet-sugar industry of this country. They would not feel it at all.

But my purpose, Mr. Chairman, at this time, in order to relieve the extreme tension under which this House has been in the last three days in the consideration and discussion of this bill, is to call the attention of the members of the committee, and through them the attention of the country, to a matter which I presented to Congress last Monday in the form of a resolution, which I will now ask the Clerk to read in my time.

House resolution No. 203.

Whereas it is alleged in the public prints and in newspapers recognized of the highest standing in various parts of the country that a combination of six of the leading meat producers of this country has been formed for the purpose of controlling trade in meat products to the exclusion of smaller companies and individuals, and does control such trade to the immense amount of $900,000,000 annually; that such a combination is formed for the purpose of restraining and controlling trade in meats and meat products and for raising the prices of the prime necessities of life; that such combine is apportioning territory and securing large rebates from railroads and interstate traffic; and

Whereas it is stated in the public prints and newspapers of the highest character that these six companies forming said combine have during the last year, by raising excessively the price of beef and beef products, secured a net profit for themselves of $100,000,000; and

Whereas the following allegations are made in the New York Herald, a highly respectable and influential publication printed in the city of New York:

"Documentary proofs have been laid before the public of the oppressive monopoly of one of the most rapacious of all trusts, the beef trust, wielding a power to make a prime necessity of life a costly luxury. They show a combination of six or seven big concerns to monopolize the cattle trade of the West, control the meat market of the East, and advance prices to a pitch that means extortion to all consumers and deprivation to many, and this in order to enrich themselves at the expense of the masses. The methods of the beef trust would seem to constitute one of the worst abuses at which the anti-trust statute of Congress was aimed or at which any antitrust law can be aimed. It is a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade. It is a monopoly destructive of competition. It controls prices and enforces extortion. It has the people, and especially the poorer masses, at its mercy in the matter of daily food. Its operations are interstate, and hence within the jurisdiction of Congress.

"Now arises the question vital to the public, whether such a trust is beyond the reach of the law. If its methods are not beyond the reach of the Federal law, then it is high time for the Attorney-General of the United States to move for the enforcement of the statutes. If it does not reach this outrageous abuse, then it may be pertinently asked, 'Of what earthly use is the law?' In either case it is up to the Department of Justice to take hold of this matter with promptness and vigor, that the people may know whether the existing statute affords any protection against one of the most oppressive of all trusts and whether additional legislation is needed to that desirable end.

"Moreover, it is charged that this same combination is violating the interstate-commerce law, designed to prevent unjust discrimination and favoritism in freight charges. That also is a matter to be rigorously looked into and the law enforced if violated. It is now for the Department of Justice at Washington to apply the remedy for evil, if existing statutes afford any remedy. If they do not, then it is high time for a law that will reach such abuses."

Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the House of Representatives what steps, if any, have been taken by the Department of Justice toward an investigation of the alleged charges hereinbefore stated; what, if any, steps have been taken toward ascertaining the truth or falsity of these charges, and whether there has or has not been, in his opinion, an infringement of the law; and if so, what steps, if any, have been taken toward a prosecution of the parties violating the law.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not vouch for the truth of the allegations that are contained in the resolution, but in my judgment they come from the most conservative people and influential newspapers throughout the country, from Kansas to Maine, and I do not believe they would make these statements unless they had the evidence at hand for the proof of them. Now, if these allegations are true, and I must assume that they are from the sources from which they come, then these companies are openly violating the law, and I am confident we have sufficient law already to punish the violators of it. Chapter 647 of the laws of 1890 provides in the first section as follows:

SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Now, the second section provides:

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

It occurs to me, sir, that if these allegations are true, then the parties who have entered into this combine are amenable to the law. There are six corporations or companies who have entered into this agreement and contracts for the purpose of monopolizing and raising the price and controlling the sale of one of the prime necessities of life—meat and meat products. The allegations claim that the companies who have entered into this combination are Armour & Co., The Cudahy Packing Company, G. H. Hammond, Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, Swift & Co., and Nelson A. Morris. These companies control six hundred millions of money, and it is alleged in these newspapers and in the New York Herald and other papers that these six companies last year made a net profit of a hundred millions of money.

Now, the evidence that there is a combination is contained in the papers, and I want to call the attention of the members of the committee, and through them the attention of the country, to the condition in the contracts which these parties have entered into. Mr. P. L. Hughes, the eastern manager of the Cudahy Packing Company, wrote to his company in South Omaha, Nebr., as follows:

At our meeting to-day there was nothing accomplished worthy of mention after three hours of discussion. It seems we are not able to get together with the spirit that formerly prevailed at our meetings, but perhaps this will improve by further intercourse. Wheeler made a proposition, and was very persistent in advocating that we should sell but a stated number of cattle at each house Monday and Tuesday, and then meet again Wednesday, but that was voted as entirely out of the operation.

However, we all made a solemn promise that we would advance all grades from three-eighths cent to one-half cent if our stock is the same as received last week. I hope this agreement will be the means of giving us a decent price for it.

Later:

I voted in favor of the proposition for various reasons, one of which is the fact that next door to us at Harlem they have a fine house, and they will not be troublesome competitors when bound by the association rules, as they would be otherwise. The same might be said of Brooklyn, where they are selling beef directly across the street from us, and as the credit association affairs and matters pertaining to other subjects would be kept entirely separate and distinct I should certainly be in favor of taking them in.

Again—I do not read all of it, but it appears in the New York Herald of March 31:

I agreed with others that we should have a general meeting and get the market up to where it ought to be, and therefore deferred my visit to Pittsburgh until next year, although my annual passes for 1898 will expire to-morrow.

Later on he says:

While at Utica we had representatives from each of the Western shippers, and after having gone over matters generally we decided to advance the price of all grades of beef 50 cents, and we braced pork loins at 74 cents.

I have never failed to get those fellows to increase the price when I go there, but it generally lasts but a week or two. Nelson Morris has not sent an inspector there in over a year, although their man Sullivan visits Scranton and Wilkesbarre regularly. Doolittle, of Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, was there a few days this week, and he left in disgust without attempting to do anything with them. I think, however, we will get better results from there for the next week or two.

In order to show that they have divided up this country between themselves, each one taking his share, here is a letter written to Cudahy Packing Company by P. L. Hughes, wherein he states the agreement to extend credit:

First. The undersigned agree that on and after August 7, 1899, all dealers in fresh meats may have the privilege of paying their bills of the previous week on or before Tuesday of the following week, and to this end we will print on all our bills and statements "All bills payable on or before the Monday following date of sale." All fresh meats must be weighed and charged to customers on day of sale. Should, however, any dealer in fresh meats be delinquent on any account contracted after the above date, he shall be sold for cash or check only until such account is paid in full. It is further understood and agreed that this agreement does not apply to sales of provisions, but does cover all sales of fresh meats, the term "fresh meats" meaning all beef, pork, veal, or mutton in carcass, or any portion of the same, which has not been cured, pickled, smoked, or canned; also all dressed poultry and game.

Third. We hereby appoint Arthur Colby arbitrator under this agreement, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, to be paid by us pro rata, with full power to examine our books, papers, and accounts, and to impose and collect a fine of not more than $50 for each violation of this agreement that may be proved to his satisfaction, and from his decision no appeal shall lie. This appointment is terminable by thirty days' notice, in writing, on either side.

Again, mark the enforcement of the terms of the contract prohibiting either party to it from selling at less price than fixed upon. It appears in this letter from P. L. Hughes, Eastern manager to the Cudahy Packing Company, South Omaha, Nebr.:

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith drafts on our Braddock house on account of our having sold pork under the agreed price.

P. L. HUGHES.

Here is the provision in the agreement. After a purchaser has once refused or neglected for twenty-four hours, no matter what his condition may be, to pay for the goods he had bought twenty-four hours earlier, he can not afterwards purchase one pound of beef from these companies, who control over 80 per cent of the beef sold in this country; he can not go anywhere and buy a dollar's worth except for spot cash. If he has violated these rules in not paying every twenty-four hours from the time when he got his product his credit is, with this combine, entirely destroyed.

Mr. KLEBERG. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not true that in the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission it was shown that these beef-packing trusts had a rebate of 25 per cent on the railways?

Mr. THAYER. That is exactly true, and I will show that a little later. I might read more, but I have read enough, it occurs to me, to show that these people come within the provisions of the statute, namely, that they have combined for the purpose of refusing credit to the purchaser, for the purpose of controlling the output of the beef in all this country, and prohibiting any one of their members from selling at prices less than that agreed upon by the whole.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not one of the troubles to which you allude this, that in the Knight sugar trust case the court thought that the antitrust act in question did not apply to the monopoly which manufactured, but only applied to the product after it is manufactured and entered into interstate commerce; in other words, that the trust law in question did not apply to the trust which created the manufactured article, but only applied to the manufactured article after it became interstate commerce?

Mr. THAYER. I am not cognizant with the case to which the gentleman refers, and therefore can not answer his question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Clearly the act does apply to interstate contracts and interstate trust contracts, and it should be rigorously and promptly enforced. This Knight case and what the court there said is clearly set out in the more recent Addyston Pipe case, 175 United States, page 240.

Mr. THAYER. What I have asked in this resolution is that the Attorney-General shall investigate this matter of those charges, and if, upon investigation, he comes to the conclusion that these facts do not bring the parties within the statute, then I say to this House that rather than attempt to change the Constitution, which will take many years, if it can ever be done, we should apply ourselves to it at once and place some legislation on the statute book that will meet the conditions presented by these facts.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to all the speeches made on both sides of this question. I heard the distinguished leader, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE] in his opening address state the reasons which, in his view, warranted him and his committee in bringing this measure before the House. I have heard gentlemen on the other side contending that the position of the gentleman from New York and his committee is not sound. Thus far the main illustration that has been used by gentlemen favoring this proposition is the relation of guardian and ward. It has been used on more than one occasion. As I recall it, there are two kinds of guardians—guardians of the person and guardians of the property. In this case, I presume, we are guardians of the person of Cuba and also guardians of her property. As guardians of her person, what have we done? For many years she struggled for her independence, which she could not attain. We stepped in in 1898, now high on to four years ago. If I recollect correctly, about the 21st of April, 1898, we started out to relieve the person of Cuba from the control of her Spanish master. We have expended in this effort hundreds of millions of dollars. We have sacrificed many lives. We have improved the cities of Cuba; we have made that a healthy country. We have advanced her material interests in many ways. All the expenses for the doing of these things have been paid largely by appropriations made in this House out of the Treasury of the United States. So far, then, as the person is concerned, we have treated the person well. As guardians we will soon turn the island with all the improvements over to her, and on the coming 20th of May we shall make of her a free and independent government.

Now let us look a little further. We have freed her from Spanish rule and Spanish taxation, and relieved her from $300,000,000 of bonded indebtedness. Let us look at the condition of Cuba as it is now. Thus far I have not heard from the lips of any person addressing the Chair, or his fellow-members, a word showing that Cuba is in present distress. Her people are busy. She raised more sugar in the year 1901 than she had raised in any one year for many years, if ever, prior to that time. Her industries are improving. Her men and women are busy. The farm hands are being paid a higher wage to-day in Cuba than such labor is being paid in any of the northwestern States of the Union.

But we are told that we are still guardian of her person and her property. Now, I know of no law book that ever declared that the guardian must take the money out of his own pocket and pay it to the ward whenever the ward came to him and asked for such payment. I have known, as a lawyer, that the court has held the guardian to a strict accounting for the manner in which he controlled the person of the ward and the manner in which he controlled the property of the ward. Now we have a new doctrine advanced in this House by eminent lawyers—the doctrine that we must take $8,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and give it to Cuba, the ward, out of our own money. What right have we to do that? Fellow-members of this House, we have been elected here to represent the people of the United States. We have been sent here as the agents of our own people. We have been told to conserve the interests of America. In 1896 and in 1900 we announced as Republicans certain positions in our national platform, which I quote:

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

We renew our faith in the policy of protection to American labor. In that policy our industries have been established, diversified, and maintained. By protecting the home market, competition has been stimulated and production cheapened.

When the distinguished leader on the Republican side, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], was confronted by his speech made in 1897, in which he said that he hoped that for twenty-five years the tariff would remain and there would be no change in it, he quickly turned round and said:

Ah, yes; that was made at a time when there was no war and no prospect of war in this country.

That was in 1897, at the extra session called by Mr. McKinley after he had been elected and inaugurated President of the United States. I heard that speech on the floor of this House. I desire here and now to read what the Ways and Means Committee then—and members now—said. I read:

What shall be done with the sugar trust? Well, I will tell you what, in my opinion, is the best way of dealing with it. Establish a beet-sugar factory in every Congressional district in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Give competition, and lots of it, everywhere. Put the farmers over against the trust by passing this bill, and reduce the price of sugar so that German raw sugar can not be brought in to be refined here. Gentlemen on the other side, come over and help us, while we help the farmers out. [Laughter and applause.] You grangers over there, come and help us. You Populists that go up and down the streets day after day proclaiming your devotion to the interests of the farmers, help us out now when we are trying to help the farmers in this industry that we can establish so successfully. In this way you will do something toward demolishing the trust. You will accomplish more in this way than by mere invective—by running windmills and all that. [Laughter and applause.]

Why should we not produce all of our sugar in this country? Why, it costs us, Mr. Speaker, about one hundred millions. We were looking around for proper subjects for taxation. We knew that sugar would produce an enormous revenue; and besides all that, we knew that an adequate protective tariff would build up the industry in this country, and as it was gradually built up the revenue from that source would be reduced; by and by the revenue will come in more largely from other sources, and when this industry is fully established and revenue from sugar ceases, the reduction will keep pace with the increase. The thing will regulate itself; we will not disturb our tariff in the next quarter of a century. And then—

[Mr. Dingley, March 22, 1897, RECORD, p. 121.]

The duty on sugar has also been increased, both for purposes of revenue and also to encourage the production of sugar in the United States, and thereby give to our farmers a new and much-needed crop. We now pay foreign countries about $4,000,000 for imported sugar, notwithstanding the abnormally low price, and this sum will soon be increased to $100,000,000. The success which has attended the growing of sugar beets and the production of beet sugar in California and Nebraska in the past five years, not to mention the progress in the production of cane sugar in Louisiana, has made the problem of producing our own sugar no longer doubtful; and now that we must have the increased revenue from sugar for the present, a favorable opportunity presents itself to give this boon to our agriculture.

We are going to force upon Louisiana that which she dare not ask for herself. Suppliant at the hands of Congress, with people representing not the claims and the clamors of her own people, we will force upon her the beneficence she dares not hope for or ask for herself. We will give to the sugar producer of Louisiana an opportunity to enlarge his products and turn over some of the splendid lands of that beautiful State to the production of sugar, instead of corn, cotton, and other products of the soil; and so, Mr. Chairman, throughout Nebraska, through Kansas, and all of the States of the Union we propose to offer the same beneficent opportunities.

The Republican party comes and offers to the agriculturists of this country this magnificent boon. We will protect the industries of the country in all directions from further demoralization; and we ask you to turn aside hundreds of thousands of acres of the splendid lands of all of these States from the production of corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, and cotton, to be put into an already overstocked market, to the production of sugar, and give to the farmers upon the farming lands of the country a better market, with less competition than they now have.

With regard to sugar, I predict that if the tariff fixed by this bill is unchanged for a period of ten years we will at the end of that time be producing not only enough for our home consumption, but as much as we care to export, and at very little additional cost to the consumer. The farmers in the 20 States where the sugar beet can successfully be raised will reap a double benefit from the development of the sugar industry—first, because the sugar beet is a more profitable crop than wheat or corn, and second, because the land devoted to raising beets will no longer be producing wheat and corn, and the lessened production will increase the price of these products.

In 1898 came the war with Spain. Within three months after it was declared we had conquered Spain, and Cuba was practically free. That was in 1898. But here is a platform prepared by the Republican party in 1900. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, what is your answer to that? You state that the war was the cause of your change of front on this question, and yet the war was ended nearly two years before this platform was made. Why did you not, some of you who were delegates to the national convention, stand up there when the plank I am about to read was presented and say: "Here is a plank that is not true, and must not be put in the platform?" Here is the plank to which I refer:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce, in return for free foreign markets.

I stand squarely upon that platform now.

That was our platform then. We reaffirmed our determination to stand by a protective-tariff policy. There is not a Republican sitting here in this Hall to-day who does not know that in every Republican convention in every State we declared again in our platform that we would not make any change upon this question. Every one of us went to our people and said: "It is not so much the money question that is disturbing our country; the trouble is due to tariff tinkering." We went to our people and asked them to send us back to Congress, promising that we would stand by the doctrine of protection; that we would stand by the doctrine of Republican reciprocity; that we would continue the prosperous conditions in our country, if our party was continued in power. Are we all to-day keeping the faith?

Oh, but gentlemen say, "the exigencies of the times, not here, but in Cuba, demand this measure." Sir, the only chart that governs my action in this House is the chart that directed my footsteps when I came here as a member of Congress, as one of the results of the election of 1900. When the party speaks in 1903 in a State convention or in my Congressional convention and directs me to do otherwise I will do it, and not until then. [Applause.] And I question the right of any other Republican to change front upon this question at this hour of the day. April 7, 1902, my home county spoke as follows:

The Republicans of Knox County in convention assembled desire to express their satisfaction with the existing conditions and their sincere belief that the maintenance of the same is dependent upon the continuance of the Republican party in power in nation, State, and county.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said—I listened closely to him—that when this measure was first presented to him as he heard of it, wanting a reduction of 50 per cent, he said no; when the proposition came to him with a reduction of 40 per cent, he said no; when it came as an ultimatum of the President, as he said, using his own language—I do not wish to be held responsible for it—when the ultimatum came from the President that it should be 25 per cent, he said no; but he finally said, "I will agree to 20 per cent." Ah, in his own judgment he had come to the danger line; in his own judgment he was close to the line of danger to an infant protected industry in this country of ours, and he said:

This is not my doing; I did not bring this measure here; I will not tell how it came here, but it came here, and I wish the cup was not pressed to my lips, and I do not want to drink of it.

Gentlemen, I propose, as a Republican, not to drink a drop of it, 20 per cent or any other per cent. [Applause.] I listened also to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and I found from him no reason why we should do this, except an anticipated trouble. Oh, he said, in the future there is financial trouble for Cuba, and that we must anticipate—the financial crash that will come upon that people—and we must legislate for them. Gentlemen of the House, we heard it first when we heard it in December; we heard it again in January; we heard it again in February; we heard it again in March. It is now close on the middle of April, and that island has not sunk into the sea nor have the people gone into financial ruin and bankruptcy—not at all.

It is a part of the Cape of Fears. In the old geographies you will remember that beyond a certain line there was a great shadowy substance which was called the Cape of Fears, but as the mariner got out into it he found it disappeared; and so, my Republican friends, if we can resist this a little longer, this anticipated trouble will be found another Cape of Fears that our distinguished leaders and mariners will have no trouble with if they will stand by the Republican party and the Republican pledges they have made to their people in their districts.

But what do they ask us to do by this bill? They ask us to go to the Treasury of the United States and take out $7,000,000 arising from sugar duties that comes in here and $1,000,000 arising from tobacco duties that comes here, and give it to somebody, somewhere. And what do we get in exchange? Nothing. There is not a consumer in the United States who will get his sugar one cent less or one ten-thousandth part of a cent less than he does today. Then what will the consumer get? He will get $8,000,000 less in the Treasury, which has to be made up in some way by taxation upon the men and the women that we are supposed to represent in this body. That is the first proposition. Is there financial distress in Cuba that we should do this act? No. Is there any reason assigned? No; except possibly that we may get a little more trade. How much more? Thirty-eight million dollars of the trade of Cuba.

They say Cuba has a trade with the world to a certain amount. A certain amount comes to the United States. The difference between what comes to the United States and what goes to the balance of the world is $38,000,000. I desire to state right here that our farmers furnish to Cuba now all the hogs and sheep she buys. We also furnish her now all the soft coal and paving brick she uses. We furnish her now practically all the bran, wheat, corn, oats, flour, cars and rails for railroads, and carriages and vehicles she now uses. The passage of this measure will not increase our market for the above-mentioned articles one bit, as we have it all now. Now they say if you will give to somebody, somewhere, $8,000,000 of clean money you can have the opportunity of taking your chances and getting profit on a prospective trade that may never come to any person in the United States. Is not that a smart bargain for statesmen to make with the people's money out of the Treasury of the United States? And yet it is your bargain.

Oh, you say, it will not affect the sugar interests of this country. Gentlemen, I believe as a Republican in standing by the Republican members of Congress. I have confidence in the Representatives from Michigan; I have confidence in the Representatives from Minnesota; I have confidence in the Representatives from California, Utah, Washington, North Dakota, and Wisconsin. They are my own kith and kin, politically; they belong to my side of the House; they come from Republican States which send solid Republican delegations. Am I to say that their judgment is not correct? I am supposed to represent my district. Each individual is supposed to stand on this floor representing his individual district. Do not the gentlemen from those States know best the interests of their States, and every one of them declares on the floor of the House and elsewhere that this bill, if passed, means the destruction of sugar-beet property in their States. How much is interested in it? As I recall, one gentleman stated about $49,000,000. How many people? In the neighborhood of 40,000 people are dependent upon this industry. Thousands of acres of land are used in raising beets; 30,000 people are employed in this industry alone, in the field and in the factory, and in addition there are thousands of people employed in the Southern States in the production of cane—your people and mine, the people who pay the taxes, who support the schools and the colleges, and who build the roads, and who, when difficulty comes, defend your flag and mine. [Applause.] I am legislating for them; I am not legislating for some one else, somewhere else.

When this bill passes, if pass it does, and the factories are closed, or the number of men employed in the factories is lessened and their wages are reduced, you will have put to work a condition of affairs that you can not down. You will have started for self-preservation the great organizations of the United States, the labor organizations in the cigar factories, in the tobacco factories, in the fields and in the factories of the beet-sugar industries and the cane-sugar industries, and link by link they will gather together, and in my judgment they may change the political complexion of this House. [Applause.]

I am for the American farmer, native and naturalized. I am for the American factory hand and the American laborer, by birth and by choice, as against those people over on the other side, for they have no further claim upon us on this question as against the interest of our own people. But where is the advantage? I ask. None. Oh, but they say that it will not affect the price of sugar in this country; that sugar will remain the same; that the beet-sugar industries will thrive; that they will get the same price from the consumer that they are now getting. I deny it. Why do I deny it? I will give you my reasons. As the proof shows, in the central portion of our country the American Sugar Refining Company—the sugar trust, as it is known—have taken the profits that they have in their treasury and have temporarily and locally underbid the factories that are there—have put them down by competition and closed them. You gentlemen who favor this bill propose to give annually to that trust from two to ten million dollars as a net profit and gain. They will take that two to ten million dollars and they will go up into the Northwest and undersell your factories. You have given them a club in the shape of money to go up and undersell those people, so as to drive them out of the market; and when they have driven them out and their factories have closed, then they will control the market and immediately advance the price of sugar, for the only persons that refine sugar in the United States are the sugar trust.

Remember that the beet-sugar factory takes the raw beets and by the processes of that factory turns over the refined sugar to the consumer. The cane-sugar planter raises his cane and sells the raw product to the only buyer, the sugar trust, that controls the market for the raw product because it is the only buyer. Now you propose to give to that one market from five to ten million dollars in cold cash with which to throttle and destroy the only opposition that it has in the United States. Do you believe it will not do it? You have more faith and confidence in the sugar trust than I have if you believe that, because this is a simple business proposition with the sugar trust. For one, I am not in favor of it and I shall not so vote either in the Committee of the Whole or in the House.

In so doing I do not believe I am any less a Republican. I believe I am a truer and a more genuine Republican by so voting here than by voting the other way. [Applause.] Why do I believe it? Because I am sustained by the Republican platform and by the utterances of McKinley and Roosevelt, because I am not favoring reciprocity upon a product produced in another country which enters into competition with a product produced in this country. We have never favored that. It is not Republican doctrine. Mark the distinction. We believe in a trade, in trading an article that we produce in this country for one that is produced in another country the like of which is not produced in this country. That is Republican reciprocity. We do not believe in trading an article produced in this country for a like article produced in another country for the purpose of striking down and destroying an infant developing industry in this country which we pledged to maintain and develop in our platforms of 1896 and 1900. That is the distinction. We call it fair trade. You upon the other side call it free trade.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. You might just as well reciprocate on Australian wool.

Mr. PRINCE. We might just as well reciprocate on wool with Australia, and I do not believe there is a gentleman from Ohio who would venture to vote in favor of that for a moment.

But you insist that it is not the danger point. We insist that it is. You insist that if this legislation is not passed Cuba will have future financial distress. We insist that if this legislation is passed, beet-sugar interests will be destroyed. In a question of honest doubt are you for Cuba against your own people? We are not. We quote the gentleman from Ohio, as he told of the drop from 50 to 20 per cent. The danger there was so close in his judgment that he was willing to take chances at that time. Now we are not willing to take those chances. The danger line is below that, and we believe it is at the very initial point.

But I am glad to state that this measure has taken such shape that no man's party politics can be called in question for voting either one way or the other upon it. The bill was brought out from the Ways and Means Committee by three distinguished Democratic leaders joining with some of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee in voting to bring the bill to the House. When the question came up on a vote whether we should go into Committee of the Whole, as I recall it, 63 distinguished Democratic members of this House voted with some of the distinguished Republican members of this House to go into Committee of the Whole, while 41 distinguished Democratic members upon the other side joined with 39 stalwart Republicans upon this side in opposition to the motion to go into the consideration of this measure.

Then where is the party question? If it is any kind of a party measure, it is more a Democratic free-trade, tariff-tinkering, business-unsettling measure than a Republican measure in any event

[applause], for more Democrats, relatively, voted for it than Republicans. When you gentlemen on the other side seek to make a party question of it in my district when I stand for reelection, I will read the roll call. I will read the report that is signed by the men who brought in this bill before the House, and I will read the roll call in my district, and show that men on that side were as much in favor of it as men on this side. It is not a party question. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio said it was not a party question; that it was a question for each individual to solve for himself. Said he, "Choose ye this day whom you will serve, God or Baal." I do not know what he calls the name of the Deity he worships, but 39 of us worship God on this side of the House. [Loud applause.]

In conclusion, I desire to state that thus far I have heard no one affirm in debate that the late President McKinley favored the form of relief proposed in this measure for Cuba. I have not heard it stated that President Roosevelt favored this specific form of relief mentioned in the proposed measure. No such message has been sent to Congress by the President. It is true that President Roosevelt favors commercial measures favorable to the material well-being of Cuba, but he favors them along Republican lines of protection and reciprocity.

Those of us Republicans who are standing out against this measure are willing to vote to aid the material interests of Cuba along the same lines that we voted to relieve the material interests of Porto Rico. [Applause.] We favor this method, that we shall continue to collect the full Dingley rate for articles coming from Cuba to the United States, and that we shall pay over to the Cuban government such portion of the amount of the duties collected as may be necessary for the interests of her material well being, and that in consideration thereof, we shall receive from Cuba such reciprocal concessions as she may be able to grant. In other words, we are willing to refund and pay over to the Cuban government such a per cent of duties collected from products coming from Cuba as may be necessary for the interest of her material well being.

In this event, the money will go directly to the Cuban government at a time when she is starting out, and it will keep her government from being a prey from money sharks and exploiters who may desire to bond the country. It will give the government an opportunity to give her people work by employing them on public works. The benefit thus derived can be apportioned by the government, if it so desires, to the betterment of the condition of the Cuban planter, if he really is in need, which I doubt.

The owners of the sugar plantations in Cuba are largely Spanish foreigners and American exploiters, who do not need any help from this Government and who are abundantly able to take care of themselves.

The views I have expressed are clearly set forth in the following reasons:

1. It will afford relief both to the Government and to the people of Cuba.
2. It makes certain that Cuba and her people, and no one else, will be the beneficiaries of our action.
3. By its adoption we keep faith with the people of this country and with the people of Cuba.
4. It does not violate our national party platforms of 1896 and 1900.
5. It does not disturb existing conditions in this country.
6. It does not alter or modify any schedule of the present tariff law.
7. It does not injure or discourage any domestic industry or prevent its further development.
8. It avoids an inopportune agitation of questions affecting industrial conditions of unparalleled prosperity.
9. It would secure reciprocal trade concessions from Cuba and give time to ascertain the value of such trade relations between the two Republics under existing conditions.
10. Its reciprocal feature furnishes a consideration which makes the proposed measure of undoubted constitutionality. It is as competent for Congress to purchase trade concessions from foreign countries as to purchase naval or coaling stations.
11. It is sustained by precedent since the establishment of our Government, and particularly by the legislation refunding duties collected on the products of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.
12. It affords the means and opportunity for successfully inaugurating and permanently establishing the new government of Cuba during a time which the experience of all nations has shown will be its most critical period.
13. It affords relief until the present adverse trade conditions affecting the price of sugar shall have been improved by the abolishment of European sugar bounties.
14. It discharges every obligation assumed by us under the provisions of the treaty of Paris, the Platt amendment, and by our intervention to secure the independence of Cuba.

These views are in line with the President's message to Congress. [Applause.]

Those of us who opposed this legislation are willing and anxious to have the country know our position relative to this proposed bill. Those of us who are opposed to this legislation prepared a statement, giving our reasons therefor, which is as follows:

We oppose the proposition to reduce the tariff on Cuban products coming into this country because it involves a relaxation of the protective principle. The Republican platform of 1896 condemned the Democratic party for not keeping faith with the American sugar growers; we seek not to merit for ourselves the same condemnation.

The proposition to reduce the sugar tariff is unwise and unjust, because—

1. It constitutes, in essence, an abandonment of the protective principle, even though it removes only one-fifth of the duty imposed by the Dingley law. And this abandonment is most unhappy because applied to the pursuit of agriculture in the most conspicuous instance in which specific and manifest protection is given to the farmer, and at the moment when the beet industry is not only in its infancy, but in an infancy so lusty and promising as to demonstrate the certainty of a rapid and prodigious growth. The beet-sugar industry exhibits in the most perfect form we have yet known the most approved principles of protection.

Heretofore the farmer has been compelled to find his justification of protection, from the standpoint of personal interest, in the prosperity reflected from the industrial artisan, and in the main he has, through good report and evil, been bravely loyal.

Since our platform of 1896 gave a party's guaranty of permanence the people took us at our word, and we have demonstrated that in the beet-sugar industry we could more vividly than in any other enterprise illustrate to the American farmer on his own broad acres the beneficence of the American system of protection.

The American market for over $100,000,000 worth of sugar annually is rightfully his. We shall encourage no policy which delays the time when he shall come into his own.

2. As to the fancied duty to Cuba because of a distress which is only apparent in the admitted fact that every man on the island has all the work he can do at higher wages than he ever before received, we have only to say that the low price of sugar is a mere business condition of temporary character, and that to compromise with it on the terms proposed is, in its interference with the policy of protection, to pay too high a price for all the good that can possibly come to those whom it is intended to benefit.

The proposition is to undertake to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in Cuba, a foreign country and a foreign government. If we undertake it, when and where are we to stop?

It is a startling proposition entirely outside of our governmental functions and our constitutional power.

Whenever we have undertaken to insure commercial and industrial prosperity in the United States, our own country, by means of a protective tariff, we have been bitterly assailed on the ground of paternalism.

Now, at the expense of our own labor, our own capital, and our own industry, and largely at the expense of a single industry, without reducing the cost of sugar to the American consumer, we are asked to extend the paternal hand to a foreign people on the ground that, having given them liberty, we are morally obligated to secure them commercial and industrial prosperity, even at the sacrifice of our own interests.

We emphatically deny that we are under any such obligation, morally or otherwise.

We insist that such an undertaking subjects the Congress of the United States to the charge of being false to its constitutional obligations, untrue to the people it represents, and, from a political standpoint, false to the pledges made by the party to the people when it asked and received their support.

3. Entirely independent of its effect on the beet-sugar industry as a present fact in established concerns, it would smother the further development of the industry through the scores of plants now in various stages of active advancement.

An industry which has grown fivefold in the last four years, and doubled since 1900, has in it the certainty of a future development so stupendous as to beggar prophecy and appeal with cogent force to our national pride.

4. In so far as the proposition professes to be in the line of Republican reciprocity, we assert that it is essentially a denial of that great policy. We deny that reciprocity is desirable except as a corollary to the greater policy of protection. Republican reciprocity, wise reciprocity, does not seek an exchange of products at the expense of any American industry; it does not seek to give—it does not give—commercial advantage to any foreign product which comes into competition with our own products; it does not seek an exchange of products which deprives any American artisan of his work or any American farmer of an opportunity to profitably till the soil.

This was explicitly declared by McKinley in his Buffalo speech in the following words:

"By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus."

And by President Roosevelt in his annual message in these words:

"And that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries."

5. To say that the duty on sugar is to be lowered on the plea that it helps Cuba is to say that it must always be lowered when Cuba needs help; and a reduction of one-fifth by the House of Representatives means that elsewhere, both in and out of Congress, the extent of that reduction shall be measured by the varying views of those who consider it.

It must, therefore, follow that the protective principle is to be subordinated to the question as to what amount of help Cuba may need.

With such a policy declared by a Republican majority, what wise business man can be induced to invest his money in the beet-sugar industry? What promise will there be of its future development?

And if that Republican majority is once constrained to such a policy, what license have we to believe that the citadel of protection will not be further assaulted in the house of its friends? When that time comes the days of Republican supremacy will be numbered.

Never more earnestly than at this hour have we been summoned to our duty; never has the cause of protection—to which we owe our party success and our national prosperity—more needed our undivided and unflinching support.

We pledged our faith in 1896 to the sugar growers of the country, and they took us at our word; in 1897 we kept the faith and passed the Dingley law, and the people, relying on that law and our party pride and tradition, proceeded to develop in amazing proportions the industry which we specifically encouraged them to enter.

We are told that the pending proposition will not hurt the beet-sugar producers; but surely no one anywhere has asserted that it would help them.

A tariff measure which has the unanimous indorsement of free traders is not above suspicion, and a search warrant will not be needed to find all the protection that is hidden away in it.

I ask my constituents and the country to read the same, and I feel confident that they will approve of my action on this measure.

We are to-day enjoying the largest measure of prosperity we have ever known. The country does not want tariff revision at this time. The country wants to be let alone. I regard this measure as the forerunner of tariff tinkering, and I beg of my Republican colleagues not to force this matter further, as it will surely produce lack of confidence in the business interests of the country, and we may be again approaching the dark and terrible days which followed the election of Mr. Cleveland in 1892.

As a Republican I propose to stand by the platform of my party. I propose to legislate as best I know how to continue the blessings which our people now enjoy. [Applause.] Our people are busy, and prosperity and peace and plenty are abroad in the land. In the language of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, I beg of you, Republicans, "Let well enough alone." [Loud applause.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, before voting in the exercise of a choice of evils presented by the bill before the House (H. R. 12765), I desire to enter my protest against its adequacy to effect the purpose which is its ostensible object. It claims to be a bill "to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba"—a reciprocity bill. Webster defines reciprocity to be mutual obligations," and a reciprocity treaty as "a treaty concluded between two countries, conferring equal privileges as regards customs or charges on imports, and in other respects."

The Century Dictionary defines it to be "mutual responsiveness in act or effect," and "equality of commercial privileges between the subjects of different governments in each other's ports."

The enactment and enforcement of such a principle in a treaty would seem to be most beneficent, calculated to promote the peace and harmony of both, the welfare and prosperity of both. It would seem that if nations have any duties in relation to one another, the duty of reciprocity must stand at the head.

What is our duty to Cuba? Thomas Estrada Palma, president-elect of the Cuban Republic, on the announcement that the United States would withdraw from Cuba and permit her to take her place among the republics of the earth, published a declaration in which he said:

The Government of the United States has shown the most beautiful example of good faith in dealing with a weak government which it undertook to rescue from its oppressors. It has demonstrated its generosity and patriotism, and by the shedding of its own blood has helped Cuba to break the chain which united it with Spain. Some countries would have sought some pretext for selfish gain in undertaking a work of this character, and would have taken advantage of some technicality for their own aggrandizement, but the contrary spirit has been manifested by the United States, and it has given to the world an evidence of good will seldom found. The people of the United States have remembered their own Declaration of Independence, and have fulfilled a duty to mankind.

There is, Mr. Chairman, in this statement of President Palma, a fraternal spirit and a generous interpretation of our conduct which calls for the exercise on our part of reciprocity of a plenary kind. I need not say that there are many people in this country who could not sincerely indorse his declaration. There are hundreds of thousands—nay, millions—of people in the United States, and not a few under the roof of this Capitol, who hold that we have not treated Cuba as a loving mother would treat her child or a loving brother his junior; that having freed Cuba from Spain we had no right to impose our manacles upon her; that the Platt amendment included principles, defined relations, and imposed conditions which were as far as possible from reciprocity; that to establish suzerainty for an indefinite period over a beautiful land which we had promised to make independent was an act of perfidy, and that to establish laws of trade which carried poverty and destitution in their enforcement was not exactly in accordance with the great utterances of the Declaration of Independence, which Mr. Palma invokes, or the grand "self-denying ordinance" which bears the name of the senior Senator from Colorado.

The charter of our liberties, Mr. Chairman, declares that man has rights which are inalienable—rights of which he can not be robbed, and which he can not voluntarily surrender—the rights of life and liberty, without which happiness is impossible. It declares that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. It declares, in spirit, that taxation without representation is tyranny, and that no people with an overlord can be free. These principles are now scouted and derided by the party which, forty years ago, considered them sacred and declared them undeniable. We are now told that men are not equal, and differences in height, form, color, education, and intellect are pointed out. But all men are equal in the sense in which the immortal Jefferson used the words—they are equal in their right to justice; they are equal before the law. We are told that all men are not born free—that some are born slaves.

I deny the proposition. All babes on earth are born free, though some have slavery imposed upon them by the thoughtlessness or cupidity of men. The sons of the Queen of the Antilles love freedom and equality of rights as much as we do. They have suffered in the struggle to attain them for hundreds of years. I know it is the fashion of tyrants who desire to trample nations under foot to slander their people and declare them loafers, bandits, and paupers, without any sense of justice, any aspiration for freedom, or any capacity for self-government. We have heard this vile calumny under this roof and seen it in the daily papers—scurrilous defamation seeking to show that they are unworthy of assistance and of sympathy.

When Weyler established his reconcentrado camps in Cuba a howl of angry denunciation went up from all parts of the country, not least vociferous from the camps of the Republican party. Attention was called to the poverty and destitution of the poor prisoners of the tyrant. But since we have "taken over" Cuba all this seems changed. The poverty of the people is mentioned as a disgrace. They are called tatterdemalions by men who forget that our own forefathers struggled barefoot and in rags through the snows and swamps of the Jerseys to win the liberty which we have inherited. If the poverty of a people fighting for freedom is a disgrace, we must blot Valley Forge from our history and Marion's beggarly supper from the memory of our children.

The miserable provisions of this bill are perhaps better than nothing; but I remonstrate against it because it is not reciprocity and because it will not promote the prosperity and happiness of the Cuban people. Twenty per cent is a bagatelle, and it is in the interest of the sugar trusts and will give no relief to the Cubans. Fifty per cent would be much better, but I would ten times rather vote for a bill offering true reciprocity by taking off all the duty and making them free indeed. Having made Cuba our ward, we are under the most sacred obligations to take good care of her. We should adopt no temporary or transient policy. Some legislators seem to think only of the present day, and act as if ordaining justice was not at all essential to the happiness of Cubans or Americans. "You take these matters too seriously," they tell us; "things will come all right; there is no cause for worry." These devil-may-care mortals, anxious only for the present moment, remind us of that other stepmother to a large and suffering community, the optimistic Mrs. Squeers, who, when an unusually offensive dose of brimstone and treacle extorted an unusually exasperating howl of anguish, was accustomed to say, in consoling accents, "It'll all be the same in a hundred years."

We should legislate for the future. We should so legislate as to make all Cubans glad that Weyler was driven away and that Spain was compelled to relinquish her hold. Under Spain Cuba had an immense representation in the Spanish Cortes—the parliament at Madrid. Under Spain Cuba had a representation to justify taxation. Under Spain she had free trade and could sell her sugar and tobacco to whom she would. Shall we Americans adopt and enforce a policy contrasted with which the policy of Spain will seem generous and magnanimous? I would foster Cuba's interests in every possible way. Some distinguished and foolish person—I am afraid to say he was a member of Congress—perhaps the author of the Platt amendment, while in favor of coercing and dominating Cuba, has spoken of her as "our economic enemy." This designation recalls to our minds the plaint of the inebriated old Eccles in the play of "Caste," who, wanting wherewithal to get a drink, steals his baby grandchild's necklace and denounces him as a bloated aristocrat and oppressor of the poor.

Perhaps Cuba may some time seek to come into our fold. If she does so seek, and so declare, after a fair and honest general election, I would consent to hear her with every assurance of friendship and equality. But it must be after full discussion and a clear understanding.

Let it be remembered that we have made magnificent promises to Cuba, while we have promised nothing to the Philippine Islands beyond the pledges which are implied by the Declaration of Independence and by our century of history. As far as written promises go, therefore, we are under specific obligations to the Cubans.

It is still legal to hold a political meeting in Cuba. It is still permitted to read the Declaration of Independence on that island, either secretly or vociferously. But this great charter of our rights is tabooed in the islands of the Pacific. We can not quote too often for the benefit of the American people the prohibition of the War Department in order 292, section 10, entitled "An act defining the crimes of treason, etc.," and enacted "by the United States Philippine Commission, by authority of the President of the United States." It reads as follows:

Until it has been officially proclaimed that a state of war or insurrection against the authority or sovereignty of the United States no longer exists in the Philippine Islands it shall be unlawful for any person to advocate orally or by writing or printing or like methods the independence of the Philippine Islands or their separation from the United States, whether by peaceable or forcible means, or to print, publish, or circulate any handbill, newspaper, or other publication advocating such independence or separation. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Of course circulating the Declaration of Independence or the bill of rights would be a violation of this order. It would tend to excite in the Filipinos a desire to be free. Is it true, as a popular American newspaper has alleged, that a distinguished Army officer recently characterized the Declaration of Independence as "a damned incendiary document?" Whether this report be true or not, is it not true that this is a fair characterization of that document in all regions subject to this order of Taft, approved by the President of the United States? Schools of a curious kind, in which the teachers and pupils can not understand each other, are being established in the Philippines, but the pupils can not be permitted to declaim Patrick Henry's speech, "The sword of Bunker Hill," or—

Freedom's battle, once begun,
Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won.

or extracts from Webster's speeches or Lincoln's messages, or that patriotic outburst—

Stand! The ground's your own, my braves!
Will you give it up to slaves?
Will ye look for greener graves?
Hope ye mercy still?
In the God of battles trust!
Die we may, and die we must,
But, oh, where can dust to dust
Be consigned so well
As where heaven its dew shall shed
On the martyr patriot's bed,
And the rocks shall raise their head
Of his deeds to tell?

The fact is, if the Declaration of Independence is to remain repealed as far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, and this ukase of Mr. Taft's is to stand, all the reading books that go to the schools of the Philippine Islands must be revised to suit that longitude. Neither the brown youngsters nor their parents can be permitted to read any history of the United States. The situation bears some resemblance to that in the Bermudas, where the British commander has forbidden the distribution to the Boer prisoners of the books of Psalms sent out from this country on the ground that some of the Psalms are aggressive and warlike and "calculated to encourage false hopes."

Our mistake in dealing with Cuba has been in not carrying out in word and letter the joint resolution which Senator TELLER offered and President McKinley signed, and of which this is the last section:

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island [of Cuba], except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

This might be called a conscience offering to justify to the American people their own action. It was universally accepted as pledging the United States to retire immediately from Cuba just as soon as the Spaniards were expelled and the island delivered to the Cubans. It was adopted four years ago—April 20, 1898. The Spanish war ended in the treaty of Paris eight months later. From that day to this we have heard of no single act of disorder in Cuba. Since that date and that action Cuba has been as peaceful as Indiana—as peaceful as New England.

Yet the Administration deemed that the adoption and imposition of the Platt amendment was essential to the pacification of Cuba! In fact, the pacification of Cuba is the only excuse for the adoption of that amendment. For on June 14, 1901, the author of that amendment, in a public speech in New York City, declared that "during the last two years and a half not an American soldier in Cuba has been called outside of barracks for military service." When asked what he meant by alleging that his amendment was necessary to the island's pacification, he said, virtually, "If we do not bind her hand and foot, she may some future day become turbulent and unpacified."

So an alleged "treaty" has been made, forcibly imposed upon Cuba by the United States, binding her to do certain things and to forego doing certain other things. It is by sacrificing her independence that she has become independent. Is she happier than she was under Spain? Is she more prosperous than she was under Spain? Has she the liberty we promised her and what she had a right to expect of the American Republic? Let her people answer, when they get a chance. Let us solicit an answer from the American-Spaniard, Mr. Palma, who, a citizen of New York for many years, has now been declared elected President of Cuba, but hovers, shivering, in the American metropolis, fearing to return to his native land to be inaugurated.

The mistakes which many well-meaning Americans make concerning this subject are these: First, they assume that our Republic can seize subject provinces and hold vassals because the monarchies of the Old World do so. Second, they assume that no people are fit for self-government who have an idea of government differing from our own. Let us examine these. If this Republic can rightly steer as a buccaneer across the seas, lay hold of defenseless islands, and brand them as its own, against the will of their millions of inhabitants, then the Declaration of Independence is not true and the peans we have raised to liberty are but the cant of hypocrites. Gibbon calls attention to the fact that the Republic of Rome first felt its foundations sapped when it reached out its bandit hand and seized Sicily and other outlying nations to increase its power. Anthony Froude, the distinguished historian, says in Chapter I of his Cæsar:

If there be one lesson which history clearly teaches it is this: That free nations can not govern subject provinces. If they are unable or unwilling to admit their dependencies to share their own constitution, the constitution itself will fall to pieces from mere incompetence for its duties.

This was the very mistake which England made in dealing with her American colonies. She taxed them lightly, to be sure. She let them have their own way in most matters, but she refused to admit them to the equal rights of British citizenship. This is the mistake which England makes in dealing with Ireland. She allows Ireland representation in Parliament, but imposes upon its people disabilities that are intolerable. The brand of Great Britain is upon India. Being a monarchy, she can hold down the oriental empire with a mailed hand. She is endeavoring to put her brand upon the Boer republics of South Africa, but up to the present time has succeeded only in marking them faintly with a rubber stamp.

Great Britain has killed the Boers, but they are still there; she has beaten them, but they are unconquered; she has scattered them to the four quarters of South Africa, but she meets them on every crossroad; she has made camps of death along the railroads and protected her soldiers behind these prison pens of Boer women and children, but Botha, Delarey, and De Wet carry on the campaign with a desperate resistance hitherto unknown in the history of warfare. Kitchener says to the Boer women: "Send for your husbands to come in and surrender and we will change your swamp camp to the hillside and spare your babies' lives;" and the Boer mothers, braver than the Spartan mothers, answer Kitchener back: "Murder us if you will and kill our babies; we tell our husbands to fight on." These heroic women and their babes, according to the account the British themselves send us, are dying at the rate of four or five hundred to every thousand in a year, and still the mothers spurn the tyrants' offer of bread presented as a bribe. And this free Republic says not a word.

In the entire Transvaal and Orange Free State there are fewer people, counting men, women, and children, than there are in the city of Washington, and the Boer men are reduced to a mere handful fighting against the fearful odds of 15 to 1. Of these heroes, the Boer delegates to America who were refused audience by the President, issued a statement before sailing for Europe in which they said:

Their farms have been ruined; their houses burned; their stock and agricultural implements destroyed; their orchards leveled to the ground; their women and children driven by force into those awful deathtraps—the concentration camps—resulting in the loss of whole families in an incredibly short space of time; their leaders, some already banished for life, and the others, according to proclamation, with the same fate before them; their property liable by proclamation to confiscation, in order to pay for the horrible reconcentrado system; their generals, leaders, and burghers, like Lotter, Scheepers, Louw, and others, shot or hung after court-martial—the veriest travesty of justice when the life of an enemy is at stake during war, when men's passions are inflamed and their judgment clouded—and, lastly, no definite prospect before them, in case they surrender, but the very definite statement of Lord Salisbury, that they shall not have a shred of independence.

We respectfully urge upon everybody in the interest of civilized methods of warfare to protest, first, against the system of concentration camps; second, against the execution of our leaders and generals, and, third, against the proclamation of banishment and confiscation.

These are noble descendants of the "free Frisians" of old, whose boast it was that no Roman taxgatherer had ever set foot among them, and of the Dutchmen who in a later day for generations resisted the power and the cruelty of Alva. And these burghers have been reenforced by the blood of the Huguenots, men who amid suffering and every privation so long withstood the terrible siege of La Rochelle.

Bertrand Shadwell, of Chicago, well sums it up as follows:

I've read my "Mottey," and I see again
Some of its stubborn Dutchmen on the stage—
Pick of Prince Maurice's own fighting men
Come back to life from that historic page—
The same old dogged valor, calm resolve
To free their land or sleep beneath its sod
(As constant water-drops the rocks dissolve).
The psalm, the prayer, the steady faith in God.
I see pale Philip in his palace halls
Reading the last dispatch which Alva sends:
"To-day the mine is sprung, the city falls.
The leader dies, and all resistance ends."

And still, their captain captive, wounded, dead
(Who was their heart, their brain, their sword, their steed),
Another and another in his stead
Springs to the van to battle and to bleed.
Doomed and defeated in a hundred fields,
When all but honor seems forever gone,
There's not a man who owns his freedom yields,
But, undespairing, still they struggle on.

The concentration camps which the British have established in South Africa are places of indescribable and inconceivable torture—veritable camps of death. The motive behind their existence seems to be the cumulation of so much distress as to intimidate the fighting men in the field and compel their withdrawal. If the fighting men persist, the only ultimate result seems to be extermination. Even the London Times, the Government's own, published a year ago letters from its correspondent in the field, of which the following are portions:

In one tent I saw a 6 months' baby gasping its life out on its mother's knee. The doctor had given it powders in the morning, but it had taken nothing since. There were also two or three others drooping and sick in that tent. In the next, a child recovering from measles, sent back from the hospital before it could walk, lay stretched on the ground, white and wan, while three or four others were lying about. In another, a dear little chap of 4 had nothing left of him but his great brown eyes and white teeth, from which the lips were drawn back, too thin to close. I can not describe what it is to see these children lying about in a state of collapse. It is just exactly like faded flowers thrown away. And one has to stand and look on at such misery, and be able to do nothing.

Though many of the officers in charge of the different places are really kind and do what they can to help, frequently the women are in want of almost the absolute necessities of life. In some cases there is so little fuel that on many days people can not cook at all their scanty rations of raw meat, meal, and coffee; while we learn that clothing is very scarce, some women having made petticoats out of thick, rough brown blankets, and nearly all the children have nothing left, but a thin print frock; while shoes and stockings are long since worn-out. Some of those who have recently come into the camps are shortly expecting their confinement, and yet they have to sit all day upon the bare ground, drenched with storms, or try to rest within their tents, while the sun pours down through their single canvas and the temperature reaches 105°, or even 110°; and with the winter, which is shortly coming on, we fear that their sufferings from the cold will be even more intense than the hardships which they have endured in consequence of the excessive heat. Most of them have no mattress on which to lie down, and are subject to any inclemency of the weather. Of course, anything like privacy is out of the question.

The Times said a year ago:

Miss Hobhouse has been able to do something to alleviate the worst cases of distress, and the military authorities have shown themselves willing to adopt various suggestions which her woman's wit has put forward on behalf of her suffering sisters.

But when this same Miss Hobhouse went again to South Africa last fall to bring home reports from the concentration camps, she was not allowed to leave Cape Town, and a letter from there states that—

When the return steamer was ready to sail for England she was notified to take it. She declined, and was tied in her chair with her shawl and carried to it by five soldiers.

The Red Cross Society also, the angel visitant of all armies, has been prohibited from visiting the concentration camps.

The following extract from a letter from a clergyman's wife in one of these pestilential prisons gives some idea of its condition:

WOMAN'S CAMP, January 3, 1902.

I am afraid we will all die of fever if we remain much longer in this crowded and closed camp. The wire fencing is quite close to the tents, and there is no air, and there is no chance for a walk in order to get a little fresh air. We can not even go into town any more. Measles, whooping cough, and fever have been raging most furiously among old and young. Oh, to see the dear little children wasting away like tender plants before the hot rays of the sun. Every day there are 2, 3, up to 8, to be buried. We can not live in these single Bell tents; they are too hot in the daytime, even though the lower part is rolled up.

All of a sudden a thick cloud comes from the Natal Mountains; it rains, and you go in for the night with a very cold, damp wind playing upon you all night. Often these tents leak, for some of them are old and thin. Many a measles patient was wet all over, and consequently died of inflammation of the lungs. Even though the tents do not leak, still your bed and clothes and everything gets quite damp on rainy nights. We have to fasten up the openings of the tents on rainy days and creep in underneath, through the mud. Oh, it is a horrid life. There are broken hearts in almost every tent. "Rachel weeping for her children, and will not be comforted, for they are not." Oh, when will an end come to all this suffering and abomination of desolation? "My soul is troubled therewith." Poor Mrs. L. is no more; she got the measles; her tent was near mine. I watched over her and brought her food. She did not seem bad at first, but her tent got wet and she got inflammation of the lungs. I went immediately for the doctor; he had his hands so full that he could only come three days later. He took her to the hospital, where she died the same day in full confidence of her Saviour. May we be enabled to sing "Peace on earth," for now it is hell in South Africa; and, oh, I can not stand it any longer.

YOUR LOVING FRIEND.

From one farmhouse alone 10 children died. In nine months the official returns show (February, 1902) an increase in the death rate among the children of 450 to the thousand, and one of the semi-official statements declares that "not a child under 2 years of age is left alive in the Transvaal" at this time.

Instead of fighting barbarians, Great Britain in this war has proved herself barbarian. She has taken to killing her prisoners of war on the plea that they are traitors. The disgraceful act which the United States was not driven to during four years of desperate rebellion is not too disgraceful for Great Britain to adopt as one of the rules of her warfare. Not only private soldiers have been deliberately murdered by her under pretense that they owed her allegiance, but such great commanders as Scheepers have been ceremoniously executed in the presence of their relatives and friends on the ground that they were rebels against British authority.

In sharp contrast to this the Boers, who have captured twice as many prisoners of war as they number fighting men, have let them all go without even a parole, and when they caught the great pet of London society, Lord Methuen, they merely said a prayer over him and released him. Some of the friends of the burghers indeed charged them with an excessive humanity. But it is certainly a humanity for which, even if Quixotic in its tenderness, they will not be likely to suffer in the judgment of history.

The dreadful fact that the United States is in some sense an ally of Great Britain in this war upon the Boers is one for which the American people when they next go to the polls will not be likely to forgive this Administration. More than half a hundred thousand horses have been corralled in the West by British quartermasters, driven on British transports without disguise, and carried to reinforce the British army in South Africa. The Administration has not been able to find in its principles or its feelings any warrant whatever for interfering in this shameful traffic. The people, when the question reaches them for solution, may not be so blind or so dumb.

When the dastardly war of England against South Africa began her defenders affirmed that the Boers were ignorant and filthy barbarians and not fit for self-government. She made exactly the same plea that our Government is making against the Filipinos. They are both equally mistaken. The most ignorant and debased people on earth are fit for self-government. They may not be fit for a republic, but a republic is not necessarily the best form of self-government. A monarchy may be the best form of government for those who are not fit for anything better. But whether they establish a republic or a monarchy or an absolute despotism, every people on earth are qualified to govern themselves. They may not have newspapers, they may not have schools, they may not cherish high aspirations, but they know better than anybody else can know the conditions that prevail among them and the environment in which they live.

It is for this reason that the Papuans are better qualified to govern themselves than the people of Massachusetts are to govern them. It is for this reason that the people of Boston, Philadelphia, or Chicago could not make the Society Islanders, Greenlanders, or Patagonians more happy by seizing their lands and trying to teach them a lofty civilization. Therefore, to discuss the question whether any given people are qualified for self-government is to waste time and breath. All people on earth are so qualified. If this Republic shall hold in fee the Sulu Archipelago for a hundred years, it is doubtful if it succeeds in increasing one iota the happiness of its people. The only benefit one nation can confer upon another is in establishing reciprocal (preferably free) commercial relations and in setting a friendly example in improved methods.

For the people of these States to insist that the inhabitants of Luzon, Samar, Mindanao, and Guam are not qualified for self-government merely because their character, relations, civil and social customs, and personal requirements demand a kind of government different from ours is an exhibition of towering conceit. If our temporary possession of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines is to be anything better than an unmitigated curse for them and us, we must show that we love liberty so well that we will concede it to them the moment they demand it. We must restrain our egotistical declarations of supremacy; we must concede to them abundant capability for self-government; we must sheathe our sword without hesitation or delay, and we must set them an object lesson in prudence, kindness, progress, modesty, wisdom, love, justice, and self-control and self-denial that will make us, without asserting it, an exemplar of what enlightened self-government ought to be. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue certain temporary permits; and H. J. Res. 155. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a monument in Charlotte, N. C., for the ornamentation of the public grounds in that city.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, this bill, unless it be properly amended, is a sham and a pretense on its face. Pretending to give aid to Cuba, it demands as a condition precedent of Cuba the enactment of immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws as fully restrictive of immigration into Cuba as the laws of the United States before our Government is to enter into negotiations of reciprocal trade relations with Cuba. It further requires concessions in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States by rates of duty which shall be less by an amount equivalent to at least 20 per cent ad valorem upon such products and manufactures than the rates imposed upon the like articles when imported into Cuba from the most favored of other countries. Then, and not till then, shall there be a reduction of the tariff of the United States against Cuba.

In other words, Cuba must first shackle herself with such immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws and restrictive tariffs against other nations as we choose to impose upon her before she is to receive our 20 per cent tariff reduction. I submit that this kind of help to Cuba is very much like cutting a man's head off to cure him of the headache—the remedy is most effective, but it does not benefit the patient. It occurs to me that the Platt amendment has already deprived Cuba of much of the independence that was vouchsafed her by the Teller amendment and that if we now pass the Payne reciprocity bill, there will be nothing more left, in point of fact, than a military possession, and we shall have simply added another colony to our already large variety. It strikes me that if Cuba actually asks for bread, we are giving her a stone and that this bill is completely stripped of its mask of pretended American generosity when it is conceded that the 20 per cent reduction of the tariff on her raw cane sugar will not materially aid her and that the probability is that the $8,000,000 which we take out of the United States Treasury annually is not likely to go to Cuban sugar producers, but will most likely find its way into the pockets of the American sugar refining trust.

From the arguments both for and against the bill this pretended aid for Cuba has become a hollow mockery, and the artful scheme to strike down the American production of raw cane sugar in the Southern States and refined beet sugar in the Western States is as plain as the nose on a man's face.

Is it a tariff-reform measure? No. It does not even pretend to be such, as it can only affect two Cuban products, sugar and tobacco; neither does it pretend to reduce the tariff on a single manufactured article, such as the American farmer or consumer needs and which enter into his daily consumption or use. Does it cheapen the price of refined sugar to the American consumer? No. It rather tends to raise it, by allowing the sugar trust to drive refined beet sugar out of the home market and permitting the Cuban sugar planter to cripple the American producer of cane sugar. It does not even cheapen the necessities of the Cubans, but changes the new Cuban revenue tariff as to importations from other foreign markets to a prohibitive tariff and permits the American manufacturer to add this prohibitive tariff to the price of his goods in Cuba. The Platt amendment, so called, does leave Cuba free to make commercial treaties with foreign nations; this bill aims to fetter the commercial freedom of Cuba.

But we are told that as Democrats we must support this bill in its present form because it reduces the tariff on raw sugar and is, therefore, to that extent a tariff reduction and conforms to Democratic tariff doctrine. To this position I can not assent. As a Democrat, I insist that a tariff should be for revenue, so laid as not to discriminate between classes and sections, and that it should be so adjusted as to equalize as much as possible the burden of indirect taxation, and that it should not discriminate in favor of the finished product of the manufacturer as against the raw product of the agriculturist. Necessarily, every tariff, whether for revenue or otherwise, must carry with it incidental protection to the article upon which it is levied. As a Democrat, I claim that the same incidental protection which is afforded the manufacturer should be afforded the producer of raw material, and I insist, as a Southern Democrat, that in this instance it is not fair and just or equitable to single out raw sugar and tobacco, both products of the South, and discriminate against them by reducing the tariff 20 per cent on raw sugar and not cutting off the differential on all imported refined sugar.

We are told in one breath by advocates of this bill that the reduction of the tariff on raw cane sugar will help Cuban planters, but will not injure the cane growers of Louisiana and Texas. This is strange logic indeed. This is equal to saying that if I take 20 cents from A and hand it over to B it will enrich A to that extent. The very fact that the tariff on raw sugar is lowered in this bill, whether it entails an actual loss or not, is sufficient to discourage the cane industry of the Southern States. Who will go into business or extend his investment therein with the threat implied in this measure, that the Cuban cane grower is to eventually drive the American cane-sugar grower out of the field? What effect will such unfriendly legislation have upon the domestic capitalist who has his eye now turned to the rich sugar lands of Louisiana, Texas, and Florida? Speaking of my State, I may say that Texas has an area of sugar lands equal to the whole of our sister State, Louisiana, and it is being rapidly developed into rich sugar fields dotted with sugar mills. Is this measure going to encourage or discourage this enterprise which now affords investment of domestic capital and employment of home labor? With me charity begins at home.

In the section of the great State of Texas which I have the honor to represent the cotton-boll weevil is making its ravages on the cotton planter and has almost forced him out of the business, and he has turned to producing sugar and molasses from cane, and is largely embarking in the production of these enterprises. How is this sort of legislation going to affect him? Will it not deter him in these new enterprises—cheapen his lands and investment and depress the wages of those who work in the sugar-cane fields of Texas? Do not comfort these American producers by saying we have not reduced the tariff much on sugar and tobacco. What is to stem this sort of tariff discrimination from finally taking the entire tariff from raw sugar and tobacco and including every product of the Southern farmer?

This bill is but the avant-garde of a series of measures that must follow the selfish policy of Republican reciprocity which will tend to discriminate against the raw material of the South; such a policy once begun is not apt to halt until all of the raw material of the Southern States is placed on the free list. No one is more willing to vote for tariff reductions on necessities than I am; take off the differential on all refined sugar imported into the United States, and I will vote for this bill; lower the tariff on farming implements, wire, nails, twine, bagging, paper pulp, etc., and I will vote for your bill; present any just tariff reform, and I will vote for it, but I shall not consent to a measure which strikes at a product of the Southern and Western farmers without offering to place a corresponding burden on the manufacturer. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be no one ready to go on. I want to give notice that if this occurs again we will go on reading the bill. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LACEY) having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12765, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, by an order made the other day Tuesday of next week was set apart for war claims. I would like to have that order changed from Tuesday to Friday—that is, simply changing the day from Tuesday to Friday—and I understand from my colleague, Mr. SHERMAN, that this would be acceptable to the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, Mr. MAHON.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I saw the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, Mr. MAHON, just before he left the city, and he said to me that if this question arose I might say that if some other day would better accommodate the House he was entirely willing to have a later day substituted for Tuesday under an order precisely the same as that under which we would operate on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that next Friday would be the day for the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. My information is that it would be for war claims, as war claims has had no day yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that Friday, a week from to-morrow, be substituted for next Tuesday for the Committee on War Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish we could arrange to-night for closing the general debate. If any gentleman has any suggestion to make—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understood that debate was to run until 5, but the gentleman did not occupy the time that he was expected to this evening.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not want to consent that members who desire to shall not have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that we close general debate on Tuesday of next week and take up the bill on Wednesday under the five-minute rule. That will leave three more days for general debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would not be willing, with only two or three dozen gentlemen present, to agree to that, when objection was made by the gentleman from Minnesota; and I call for the regular order, at present.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I move that the House adjourn, Mr. Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

RETROCESSION OF A PORTION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TO VIRGINIA.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 50) directing the Attorney-General to bring suit to determine the constitutionality of the retrocession of that portion of the original District of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the State of Virginia, to submit an adverse report thereon, which I should like to have read at the desk, as it relates to a matter of a good deal of public and historic interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair). The report will be read as requested.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 50) directing the Attorney-General to bring suit to determine the constitutionality of the retrocession of that portion of the original District of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the State of Virginia, submit the following report:

The territory on the other side of the Potomac River, including the city of Alexandria, which was originally a part of the 10 miles square, was ceded by Virginia for the seat of government. It was retroceded to Virginia by act of Congress in 1846, accepted by Virginia, and thereafter Congress exercised no jurisdiction over it, except so far as it controls the Arlington National Cemetery, the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture, the military school for cavalry, and the Signal Corps, with the land and buildings occupied by them.

It seems to the committee that it is not expedient that this act of retrocession should be set aside by Congress, even if Congress have the power so to do, without the consent of Virginia. Virginia accepted the transaction, it being understood that it was at the desire and for the benefit of the National Government. She has established in Alexandria the important and intimate relations which every State forms for its own citizens dwelling on her own soil; and the people, on the other hand, we presume, feel the loyal and deep attachment which such a relation excites. Such a tie ought not to be wantonly broken, and ought not to be broken at all without the consent of the parties, except in case of some paramount and overwhelming public interest.

As to the suggestion that the retrocession was unconstitutional, it seems to us the answer is that from the nature of the case it is a political and not a judicial question, and that it has been settled by the political authorities alone competent to decide it. It is like the question, What is the true State government, the true and lawful government of a State?—like the question, What is the true frontier?—where any dispute exists as to whether territory belongs to us or to a neighboring foreign country; and many like questions.

These are partly questions of law and partly questions of fact. The questions of law may be settled by the highest court to whom, in the course of judicial proceedings, they may be taken, unless and until that court choose to reverse its previous opinions. But the fact must be determined in each case, when it arises, by the jury or other tribunal authorized to find the fact. It would be utterly intolerable that territory should be held in one case to be a part of Virginia, and in another case to be a part of the District of Columbia, according as might be held in the individual case.

So it seems to us the case must be deemed settled by the acquiescence in the act by Virginia and of the United States, as manifested by the conduct of the departments of Government for more than half a century. The consequences of holding that this retrocession has been void from the beginning would be very serious.

If it be desirable that Alexandria become a part of the District of Columbia again, the only way to accomplish it will be to open negotiations with Virginia and get her consent. (See Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1.)

The committee, therefore, report adversely, and recommend that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS HERETOFORE PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar as it appears on page 5—bills passed over without prejudice, under Rule VIII. Several Senators have bills reported under that heading, which is under Rule VIII, which have never been reached in the consideration of the Calendar. It seems to be but right and fair, as those bills have been simply passed over without prejudice, that we should take them up and go as far as we can with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first case on the Calendar of bills passed over without prejudice.

ISTHMIAN CANALS.

The bill (S. 451) to provide for acquiring the rights necessary for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans was announced as first in order.

Mr. HALE. Let that bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR OACOMA, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 911) authorizing the Federal Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the village of Oacoma, Lyman County, S. Dak., was announced as next in order.

Mr. GAMBLE. I hope that that bill will be taken up for consideration at this time and not passed over. It is a matter of local importance in South Dakota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, on page 3, line 5, after the word "next," to strike out "joining" and insert "adjoining;" so as to read:

That if a bridge shall be built under this act as a drawbridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with one or more draws, as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and of spans of not less than 200 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot piers of the draws, and the next adjoining spans over the river to the draws shall not be less than 250 feet in the clear, measured at low water; and said spans shall not be less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the lowest part of the superstructure of the bridge; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river at high water.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 4, line 17, after the word "bridge," to insert "or its accessory works," and in line 18, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "substantially" and insert "unreasonably;" so as to read:

And any change in the plans of such construction or any alteration in the bridge after its construction shall be subject to like approval; and whenever said bridge or its accessory works shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, unreasonably obstruct the free navigation of said river he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 18, to add to section 4 the following:

And all railroad companies desiring to use said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all the approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, in case they shall not agree; and equal rights and privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVENTIONS OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 1104) providing for the use by the United States of devices invented by its naval officers while engaged in its service and covered by letters patent was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, the public interests require the use in the naval service of any invention or discovery covered by letters patent issued to any officer of the Navy, whether retained in his ownership or assigned to others, the Secretary shall proceed to use the invention or discovery in the manner and to the extent required by the naval service, and such royalties and compensation as may be equitably due the officer, considering all the circumstances connected with the making of the invention or discovery, and especially all facilities in originating, working out, or perfecting the invention which the officer may have enjoyed by reason of his official position, may be recovered by suit brought by the officer in the Court of Claims, and that the court shall make rules for the trial of such cases, conforming as far as may be with the rules established by the Supreme Court for the practice of courts of equity, and all cases shall be determined within one year from the filing of the petition therein unless, in the discretion of the court, upon sufficient cause shown, the time is extended; and the Secretary of the Navy is prohibited from making any contract or payment for the use of any patent taken out by any naval officer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFINITION OF "CONSPIRACY," ETC.

The bill (S. 4553) to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

MARY E. PARKER.

The bill (S. 1153) for the relief of Mary E. Parker was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary. If there be no objection, it will be regarded as before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

The bill was read; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mary E. Parker $5,000 in full compensation for extra services rendered to the United States by her husband, I. C. Parker, deceased, late judge of the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I reported that bill adversely by the authority of the Judiciary Committee, who came to a conclusion against it on my report there; but I confess I am very much shaken in my conviction. I have been shaken by a letter I got through the mail this morning, dated April 8, from the lady who is the person mentioned in the bill, which I think I ought to read to the Senate. The bill is one to give her $5,000 in consideration of her husband's extraordinary services as judge in the Indian Territory. My report and the opinion of the committee was based upon the feeling that, while this claim was just in itself, it was likely to become a precedent for like claims, and that it would be very difficult to draw the line; but, on reflection, I am more and more inclined to think that it is so absolutely unique in its character, and so impossible of recurring, that it would not be a public danger to grant this particular claim. I shall read the letter, and if anybody thinks I am a little weak in yielding to it I must take the criticism. The letter is as follows:

FORT SMITH, ARK., April 8, 1902.

DEAR SENATOR: An effort will be made during the present term of Congress to procure for me one year's salary for the extra service rendered the United States Government by my husband, Judge Isaac C. Parker, deceased, late judge of the United States court for the western district of Arkansas.

As you may remember, Senator, Judge Parker was appointed by President Grant in 1875. He had the position till his death, November 17, 1896, a period of twenty years. I write to you, Senator, begging you to look over the papers sent to the Judiciary Committee, taken from the records of the court, showing the basis of this claim.

The records of his court show that no court in the country transacted the same amount of business in the same length of time. Judge Parker held court every month in the year, never in all these years taking a vacation, holding night sessions night after night, thus saving thousands of dollars each year to the Government, but sacrificing his own life. His untimely death was the result of what he believed to be his duty as an officer of this great Government. To protect society against banded criminals, to bring peace to the Indian Territory, to stamp out the evils that afflicted it, to bring to it civilization and light. This was his labor and aspiration. That he succeeded the honor and respect in which his court was held and the advance made in the Indian Territory bear witness. For sixteen years of this arduous labor his salary was only $3,500. He was unable to save anything out of this, and his untimely death left his family destitute.

The cyclone which passed over Fort Smith three years ago leveled our home, all that was left to us, to the ground, destroying furniture, library, and all our belongings, taking from me the last vestige of support. This claim surely can not be objected to on the grounds that there is no precedent, or that it would make a precedent for district judges' families, as it is unique in itself, on account of the great jurisdiction of the court and the immense amount of work done by Judge Parker. The jurisdiction is now divided between four judges. If I have made a mistake in trespassing upon you with this matter, please pardon me. Let my helpless condition and the memory of the great esteem in which my beloved husband held you as one of our truest statesmen, who stood for justice and right, plead my excuse for appealing to you.

I earnestly ask your assistance in this matter, which seems to me but an act of simple justice.

Most respectfully,

MRS. I. C. PARKER.

HON. GEORGE F. HOAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I have no doubt the facts stated in this letter are true. I am inclined to think that while we can not admit the doctrine that extra services will warrant a claim by any public official or by his family after his death, however great these services may have been, it is almost utterly impossible that a case so extreme in all its particulars will arise. The fact that the man worked in a community different from ordinary civilized communities, as the Indian Territory was at that time; that he had an enormous jurisdiction; that he worked far into the night and all the year round without any respite; that he sacrificed his life in doing it, and left his family with nothing but the little home, which immediately afterwards was swept away by a tornado, makes the case so peculiar that there is not much danger that it will be a precedent for anything else. I shall myself, contrary to my original opinion, vote for the claim.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I asked that this bill be placed on the Calendar at the time when it was adversely reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I did so because I knew the facts of Judge Parker's life and death. He held court every day in the week, as stated by his widow in the letter which has been read. He never took a vacation. His court was in session all the time, and it was the hardest-worked court, I believe, that has ever sat in the United States. He not only held court all day, going to the court room early in the morning and holding continuous sessions during the day, but he held court at night almost all the time. He was constantly in court attending to the business of the court—the hardest-worked man I ever saw. I believe he absolutely killed himself by his devotion to his duties and by the work he did. He was a judge for twenty-one years.

We have made provision to take care of judges after they have served a considerable time on the bench, and when a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives dies in the discharge of his duties something in the way of a provision for his family is made by giving them the balance of a year's salary. Under these circumstances, and considering the poverty of Judge Parker's family—he leaving nothing whatever to them, except one building, which was blown down by a cyclone, and which they have not been able to rebuild because they did not have sufficient money—it seems to me if there ever was a case that should appeal to the humanity of Senators and justify the payment of a claim of this kind this is the case.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the amount provided in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Five thousand dollars is the amount proposed to be paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not committing myself, Mr. President, to how I shall vote on this bill, I want to warn the Senate that if they suppose this will not form a precedent that will come back here in numerous cases they are laboring under a delusion. I have had a great deal of experience with bills of a minor character, and I know from sad experience that no unusual pension bill ever passes this body that is not noticed by a very large number of people, and claims are made that precedents have been established and that their cases ought to have consideration.

Now, Mr. President, this case is very likely unique; but if the Senate passes this bill, every widow of every judge who dies hereafter, especially in straitened circumstances—and I do not think that really will make much difference—will come here citing this precedent and asking for a similar appropriation. If it is wise to do it in this case, I do not see how Congress can fail to do it in cases that will come up hereafter for our consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am willing to trust to future Senates to deal justly with other cases. We should deal justly with this case. We are a great court of equity; we represent a very wealthy, an extraordinarily wealthy, nation, which is anxious to do the just and generous thing everywhere. I think a reasonable sum of money ought to be paid, as it easily can be, to this poor widow, whose husband distinguished himself by serving with very great ability for twenty-one years, and by his fidelity to his duties killing himself, as no doubt he did, in the service of his country.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this bill; I shall vote against it, but I want an opportunity to make some reply to a paper which was read yesterday by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] concerning a proposed amendment which he intended to offer to the joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States in relation to the election of Senators.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow us just to finish the little bill which is pending, affecting a poor widow?

Mr. MONEY. How long will it take?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Only a minute.

Mr. MONEY. Oh, certainly; go on.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

✓ ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, yesterday during the morning hour, which is usually devoted to the introduction of petitions, memorials, reports of committees, and the introduction of bills, I was in the House of Representatives on official business, and my colleague [Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi] was in one of the departments likewise engaged. In that hour the junior Senator from New York read a paper concerning an amendment intended to be proposed by him to a joint resolution to amend the Constitution, should it be reported favorably, which is the one now before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, proposing to change the mode of electing Senators. I do not exactly understand why his speech was made at that time, because it is generally understood here that the committee will report adversely upon the proposed constitutional amendment. I do not know whether or not I am correct about that.

At any rate, the junior Senator from New York improved the opportunity to present a proposed amendment to the joint resolution, and in support of it to submit some remarks, which were evidently carefully prepared. I understood he read them from manuscript. In the course of his remarks he took occasion to select the State of Mississippi, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, and to criticize it for disfranchising its citizens, contrasting its meager vote with what he termed the manhood suffrage of the great State of New York, that honored him by sending him here.

I do not know whether or not the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York is intended to deter anyone from supporting the measure which is now under consideration by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It would certainly fall very short of its aim if it was so intended. In fact, Mr. President, the old days of the catapult and the ballista have passed away, and we have got down to the time of heavy artillery, and this rattle of small arms does not seem to scare anybody in his convictions on the subject of the proposed amendment. With that question when it comes before the Senate we will be prepared to deal. I for one am willing to say now that I shall vote, if it is favorably reported, or if it is brought up for consideration, for the resolution submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the reasons I will be able to state when it is apropos. For the present I content myself with replying to this fire of the skirmishers, if it should be thought necessary to do so, with the promise, however, that when the heavy guns come up we will try to give them suitable entertainment on this side.

The Senator from New York proceeded to say, among other things, and he said very truly and correctly—

This provision was not adopted because of distrust of the people, but to create a chamber of independence and dignity in which the States should have an equal voice as in their sovereign character.

And he might have added also that there never would have been a ratification of the Constitution of the United States if that clause had not been inserted, and if that clause had not been made irrevocable by any future action of the Government it never would have been ratified at all. He could have been very much more emphatic in many other ways, but as he had prepared himself with some care of course he finished his work to suit his own taste. He is perfectly correct about that.

Now, the Senator says:

The amendment under consideration proposes to make the Senate a popular body and reverse the principle upon which the Government has existed down to the present time.

I can not understand that. It does not reverse the principle which was the only principle in the case, and that was the equality of representation on this floor of each sovereign State of the Union. That was the only principle embodied in the Constitution. The method of choosing this equal representation was another matter, and went only to the manner of choosing and not to the principle of representation.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has considered the language of the Constitution on this subject?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. It gives a definition of the Senate, that the Senate shall consist of two members from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof. It does not use that peculiar language as to the House of Representatives or anything else. The idea was not that there should be two popular bodies, but it was that there should be a Senate, and you could not maintain the constitutional principle by abolishing the Senate or by having a different kind of a body. You must have a body in which the States are to be represented as equals of a particular quality and character. That is the proposition.

Mr. MONEY. The principle was the principle of equality in Senatorial representation, without which provision there would have been no ratification of the Constitution by the smaller States, as is abundantly testified to by the text. It is abundantly borne out by contemporaneous history, by the records and the journals of the convention that adopted and framed the Constitution, by the temper of the people at that time, and especially of the States, which alone had sent representatives to that convention. It was not a popular meeting. It never at any time was a meeting of the people of the United States, although a New England historian of very great renown took occasion to state during the civil war that there was not any such thing as a State mentioned in the whole instrument, although it provided that nine States must ratify it before it became the Constitution.

There has been considerable care taken all along recently to exclude the idea of the sovereignty of the State and to keep it before the public mind here and elsewhere that the Constitution was framed by the people irrespective of State lines. In fact, it was the creature of the sovereign States acting in their sovereign capacity, accrediting to that convention such delegates as each saw proper to send, and all of them acting for the States and not for the people of the United States. They were not then the people of the United States; they were the disunited States of the Confederation.

I was going to say that the principle is well established, and it can not be changed, that there shall be an equal representation, and the further language to which my distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts directed my attention is only to provide the method by which that representation shall be secured here. The language is too plain to be misunderstood, and I do not suppose there is a Senator in this Chamber who has not read it a thousand times.

The argument of the Senator from New York was that the character of the representation here would be changed if the method of selecting the Senators should be changed by an amendment to the Constitution. In other words, that to-day the sovereign States send men here because the legislature of the State is the elector of the Senators. But could not the Constitution be amended so as to make the great body of the voters the elector, and still the State have equal power of sovereignty, reserving all her rights intact just as well as to-day, when the Senator is elected by the legislature of the State? So I think my friend from New York is mistaken about the principle being at all attacked. He proceeds to say:

A number of States have by various devices prevented a third, or a half, or more, of citizens, recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States, from exercising the right of suffrage.

Does the Constitution prescribe the qualifications of the electors of a State? Never. It has no power to do anything of the sort. The Congress of the United States has no power to prescribe the qualifications of electors. Then how, in this connection, can the Senator from New York say that the citizens as such—that is, as voters for Senators—have been recognized by the Government? He speaks of manhood suffrage. Are there no restrictions upon manhood suffrage in this country? Do the felons and the criminals and the paupers who crowd the jails and almshouses of New York vote? Are they entitled to vote by the State constitution and laws of New York? Do not the women of Colorado and Wyoming and Kansas vote? There is such a thing as womanhood vote in this country as well as manhood vote, and there is a restriction in every State in the Union upon pure manhood suffrage. There is not a State which permits every male inhabitant, because he arrives at the age of 21 years, to vote in State or other elections. There is a guard thrown around the exercise of this vital principle of self-government—the elective franchise, the suffrage of the people of the country. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. He says:

The local reasons which have led to the adoption of these measures are not pertinent to this discussion.

And I am very glad he did not discuss them at this time.

The adoption of these new constitutions in several States, however, containing "grandfather" and other clauses, has led to a movement in the House of Representatives and in the legislatures of some of the States to change the representation in the House of Representatives from population to votes. That will reduce very largely the number of Congressmen which those States are entitled to.

If the States are entitled to them, then the number ought not to be reduced, and I hope I will find the able Senator from New York opposing such a measure, although he seems to take it for granted it will become law.

That measure does not receive the attention it would because, the House of Representatives being elected by the people, the vast majority of population vote upon manhood suffrage—and therefore the majorities are so large they do not feel acutely the discrimination which these measures bring about. But if in the election of United States Senators a small oligarchy—

A word the connection of which I do not see in this relation—in any State can send here a representation equal to that of great States like New York, which have manhood suffrage—

Mr. President, if the vote of all the people of a State can be called a small oligarchy, what will we say of the present system when a few corporations control the legislature and send their two instruments into this body. Is that an oligarchy or not? The people of this country are to-day very much more afraid of the oligarchy of trusts and corporations than they are of the oligarchy of the great mass of the citizens of this country, whether they are voters or not, because the two characters are not necessarily blended in the same individual—

if States in which half of the votes are disfranchised are to have an equal voice in this body with States like Pennsylvania, of five or ten times their population and with manhood suffrage; if New York, which casts, because of its manhood suffrage—

This is a sweet morsel, rolled under the eloquent tongue of the Senator from New York—

1,547,912 votes, is to be neutralized in legislation affecting her vast interests by Mississippi, casting 55,000 votes, because the majority of her citizens are disfranchised—then the situation becomes intolerable.

Is it not intolerable now to the Senator from New York? Does not that exact condition prevail to-day? And how can it be made worse when the suffrage for Senators is transferred from the legislature, whom the people elect, to the people themselves?

There are some mistakes in the statement, however, with all respect to the Senator from New York, which I shall point out. In the first place it is not true, as a matter of fact, that a vast majority of the people of Mississippi, or any majority, have been disfranchised. It is not true of any Southern State, whether it has a grandfather clause in its constitution or not. The grandfather clause of the constitution is amenable to the construction of the Supreme Court of the United States; and I venture to say that if a case comes from the State of North Carolina the court will find that the grandfather clause is not objectionable in the light of any amendment to the Constitution of the United States. But that is too large a subject to discuss this morning in the brief time I intend to occupy, begging the indulgence of the Senate.

The State of Mississippi does not disfranchise its citizens. The fourteenth amendment provides that if any State shall deny to or abridge the right of any male inhabitant to vote "the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State."

The question whether anybody has been denied or abridged in his right to vote in the State of Mississippi I shall not argue at length now, but I shall, perhaps, if the occasion presents itself at some future time. I deny that one single citizen of that State has been denied or abridged in his right to vote at any election in that State for State or Federal officers. If the State had said that a man whose skin was black should not vote, or that a red-haired man should not vote, or that a man on account of some physical disability which it was impossible for him to overcome should not vote, that would have been objectionable to the fourteenth amendment, and the court would have so held.

But when a State says, as Massachusetts says, and as Mississippi says, that a man before he can vote must be able to read—and Massachusetts adds an additional qualification, be able to write, and Mississippi qualifies that seemingly hard provision by saying he must be able to read or to understand, if read to him, a clause of the constitution—it is not a disability within the purview of the fourteenth amendment, because it is something the proposed voter can easily overcome. There is not a man with the intelligence to entitle him to vote who can not in three months acquire the qualifications necessary to vote, at the public schools scattered all over the State of Mississippi, provided for this year by a more munificent appropriation of money than that voted by any State in this Union, according to assessed wealth.

Not only that, but the further provision is made in our constitution that the man shall pay a poll tax before he can vote. There is not a man in the State of Mississippi or any other State of this Union who can not pay $2 poll tax if he desires to vote. Those are no disqualifications that the voter can not of his own motion most easily overcome and put himself on the list of registered voters of the State.

The statement as to the 55,000 votes, made by the Senator from New York, is evidently misleading, although he did not intend perhaps to mislead anybody. I think there is a misunderstanding of the facts on his part and not an intention to misstate them or misconstrue them. But 55,000 is not the registered vote of Mississippi. Those were only the votes which were cast at a certain election, and that election, on account of the lack of opposition to the Democratic party in the State, was no more than a ratification of the election returns of the primaries of the State. In the primaries of the State there is a full turn-out not only of the registered vote, but also of the unregistered vote, because in our primaries they have not held them to the legal registry for the regular election, but permit people who are not registered and could not register under our constitution to vote.

I ask him if that is to be the test—the vote cast—what will he say of the State of Connecticut, which a few years ago with a registered vote of 225,000 polled only 119,000? The people did not care to vote, and it is nobody's business but theirs whether they vote or not; and so with the people of Mississippi. If they choose to hold their real election at the primary and go but scantily to the polls at the regular election, whose concern is it but theirs? But it does not sustain the contention of the Senator from New York that they are forbidden to vote or prohibited from voting because the people do not choose to do it, not seeing any particular necessity for everybody going to two elections when the opposition ticket does not amount to anything.

The great State of Massachusetts did not poll one-third of her registered vote. I could go over the States of this Union. Take the State of New York, where the spoils of office seem to be pretty eagerly pursued and the whole force is brought out, and where the assemblymen and the wardmen and the ward heelers seem to have their followers well trained. They poll a very large manhood vote, with certain qualifications.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator ever known an illiterate white Democrat in Mississippi who did not understand the constitution?

Mr. MONEY. Did you ever know a black man who did not?

Mr. SPOONER. I never knew a black man that an election officer would not decide against.

Mr. MONEY. Do you know anything about it?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not. Therefore I was asking the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. You ask me if I know of any white voter, presumably a white voter in the State of Mississippi, who has been refused registry on account of not being able to understand the constitution. Nor do I know of a black one. I want to say in reply to the inquiry of the Senator, which was pertinent, that in canvassing the State in 1895, in which I made about 80 speeches, going nearly all over the State, I took pains to inquire of the custodians of the books of registration, and I never found a single one who said any man, black or white, had been refused registry because he could not understand the constitution.

I would not give the snap of my finger for that clause in the constitution in Mississippi so far as it affects the vote of that State. We are not attacking the negro, because we could not do it. To use the language of the supreme court of Mississippi, repeated in totidem verbis by Justice McKenna in the case of Williams against Mississippi, we swept the whole field of characteristics of the negro and legislated against them because we wanted a sound and intelligent electorate to protect our institutions from ignorance, not only from those ignorant of public affairs and public interests, but from the vicious ones. That is what we did.

The provision that hurts in Mississippi and keeps in the rear ground a vast number of voters is the tax. You can not get certain improvident people, who refuse to look beyond the needs of to-day in their physical wants, to pay $2 in February that they may vote next November. They will not do it. I have in my desk at my room at the hotel supplements to every paper in the State, or all that I get at least, showing the number of delinquent poll taxes. In one county, the county of Monroe, it is over 3,000. And so it goes. It happens that the delinquent poll taxes are generally in what are called the black counties of the State. It is not a disqualification. There is not a man in the State who can not pay $2 to vote if he wants to vote.

The point, however, that I am going to make on my distinguished friend from New York is this. While great concern was strenuously manifested in the beginning of his speech about maintaining the principle of equal representation in the Senate, he goes exactly to the contrary, in toto coelo, to show that it is a rank injustice, no longer sufferable in this body, that a little State with a few thousand votes should have the same voice that a great State like Pennsylvania or New York has. In other words, his argument is to destroy the very equality, the principle of the Constitution which he says will be violated by the provisions now pending in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and to which he has offered an amendment purposely to make it worse than it was before. If he does not want equal representation here, if he wants to destroy that part of the Constitution which its framers said should be irrevocable, then he made that argument in this speech which I will read in part:

But if in the election of United States Senators a small oligarchy in any State can send here a representation equal to that of great States like New York which have manhood suffrage; if States in which half of the votes are disfranchised are to have an equal voice in this body with States like Pennsylvania, of five or ten times their population and with manhood suffrage; if New York, which casts, because of its manhood suffrage, 1,547,912 votes, is to be neutralized in legislation affecting her vast interests by Mississippi, casting 55,000 votes, because the majority of her citizens are disfranchised—then the situation becomes intolerable.

"Intolerable" means something you can not stand any longer. You have stood it as long as you could. You have had equal representation in the Senate. The Senators from the small State of Rhode Island, of Delaware, of Nevada have been here so long the equals of the distinguished Senator from New York and his colleague and the two Senators from the great State of Pennsylvania and the Senators from the great State of Illinois that it has become intolerable to him. Oh, it is intolerable to a man representing so many millions of people and so many billions of dollars to sit here with no more power than a man from a poverty-stricken agricultural State in the South or a decreasing mining State in the West. It is intolerable, gentlemen. The whole idea of equality is intolerable to some people; yet it is the foundation stone upon which the institutions of this free country are placed and it is the muniment of title to liberty to every man in this country.

I am going to read from this singular argument again. It is Janus-like. It faces one way in the beginning and the other way in the conclusion. The anxiety for the preservation of this principle of the Constitution, the equality of each State in the Senate Chamber, is quite offset by the solicitude that the Senators representing the great States shall have more consideration than those representing States which poll a few feeble thousand votes.

Again, he says:

I am not, under ordinary circumstances and normal conditions, in favor of the proposed reduction of Representatives in the Southern States; I am not in favor of any legislation by the General Government which interferes with the local affairs of those Commonwealths—

That does credit to the sagacity and wisdom of the Senator from New York—

but if the door is opened by the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution for the changing of the character and constitution of the Senate of the United States, then that measure must necessarily be accompanied by power to insure a full and honest vote of the citizens of the Republic, and protect this body in the election of those who may be designated here as Senators.

How will it change the character and constitution of the Senate if the Senator is elected? By what subtle chemistry is the Senator elected by the legislature to be changed in mind or body or soul by the fact that at the next election he is elected not by the legislature, but by the people who elect the legislature? In what particular are his convictions to be unsettled, his disposition to be changed, his knowledge to be darkened, his counsel to be dimmed, or his voice to be made less persuasive because he has been elected by the sovereign, the source of all power in this country, and not by a delegated few whom that sovereign power has selected for this special duty according to the terms of the Constitution of the United States? I should like somebody to explain how the character of that man is to be changed.

I have been elected by the legislature, yet I am selected by the primaries. Those primaries are the Democratic voters of the State, and in Republican States a great many do the same thing. Some of them vote by convention, as they have done in Illinois once or twice, I believe. They have different methods whereby the people say how the legislature shall vote, and in the contest in Illinois to decide the seat of our genial and eloquent friend the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] it is stated that certain counties by primaries have declared for this and that candidate for his seat.

How will the Senator stop that? I ask him if his amendment should prevail, provided the other comes in, what more duty will be imposed upon the United States Government to supervise an election than it has to-day—I mean as to its effect upon the character of the representative sent here, or in the manner of voting or changing the wishes of the people, or any material fact whatever? How does it change it? What good is it to do? He says that if we have elections by the people, necessarily the United States Government must step in and hold the polls and certify to the election. In other words, the State is to be abolished; and yet that is the thing the Senator so eloquently inveighed against in the beginning of his remarks.

So swift do these contradictions tread on each other's heels—in one part, jealous for the dignity of the State and its right as a sovereign State, and in the next breath providing for an arrangement by which the same State in its most sovereign capacity, through its citizens, shall say who they will have here, yet providing for a supervision not alone in qualification, but in the casting of the vote and counting the returns and certifying the same to the President of the Senate. How do these things consist? I am glad to say that the Senator from New York can at least be acquitted of being guilty of what Lord Palmeston said, that the vanity of consistency was the vice of statesmen. He has not that vanity.

Now, he goes on, carrying out the last idea, not the first, which are here in parallel columns.

There are 19 States which have in the aggregate less population and smaller industrial, commercial, and financial interests than the State of New York, who are represented here by 38 votes, while New York has only 2.

But the Senator forgets how great the two are, which very much goes toward making up this invidious difference between the power given by the Constitution to the several States.

Twenty-three States, with a population of 13,755,364 and casting 2,363,285 votes, have a majority in the Senate, while 22 States, with a population of 60,851,857 and casting 11,609,170 votes, are in the minority.

Is this an argument for maintaining the equality of representation in the Senate on the part of the States, for preserving the dignity and independence, to quote the Senator's language, of this body, to have an equal representation of sovereign States in this great family of nations in one greater nation? Not much. But here is the argument to make this Senate like the House of Representatives, to be based not only upon the number of people within its borders, but upon the amount of its wealth; and more and more the thing come to the surface, and more and more the individual disappears below it as we progress in these advanced new ideas of the Constitution and of free government in this country.

I have the profoundest reverence for the Constitution.

I congratulate the Senator upon that. I have always noticed that those people to whom religion was the most mysterious were always the most devout; the less they understood about it the more they revered it and the more they loved it. There was once a preacher who told me that he would not have a religion that he could understand. Probably some Senators are in the same condition—they do not care about a constitution that they can understand.

Every scheme of government in every other nation of the world has failed and been changed during the last century.

We are just one hundred and twenty-five years old. According to human annals, according to years, we are in the infancy of the Republic, but I think we are a hothouse plant and develop rapidly. Some poet said that we do not live by years, but—

We should count time by heart throbs.

Measured by heart throbs and action and accomplishment, we are an ancient nation, but according to the mere annals of years we are an infant yet, and have had no very great time to change our form of government.

Our Constitution alone has stood the test of time, experiment, and expansion, and has proved the most perfect system of government ever devised for a self-governing people. Revolutions never go backward.

They have done it very often, nevertheless. It is a saying which is not true, but quite common, and which may be classed along with the other popular fallacies that are being exploded by events as fast as they appear.

With the proposed change in the constitution of the Senate the people will and ought to be fairly and equitably represented here. The next and inevitable step will be to have the people and not the States control this body.

Now, Mr. President, that is the conclusion of these remarks of the Senator. I do not see how it is an inevitable step or an inevitable conclusion, because the moment that a sovereign State, as prescribed by the amended Constitution, shall appeal to the sovereign people themselves, the source of all power, who shall vote directly for Senators, I can not see how the sovereignty of the State will be in one jot diminished or lessened or infringed upon, denied, abridged, qualified, or modified in any manner whatever.

But I do see that an effort has been made to prevent this body from being crowded by the agents of corporations and trusts and to prevent people who command untold sums of money from coming into seats, who if they had a hundred thousand dollars and proposed to come here would be put in a madhouse by their friends, but having a great lot of money it is a proper thing.

When the people come to vote upon this proposition, it seems to me that they are quite as likely to exercise sound discretion and judgment in the selection of their Senators as the legislatures, the membership of which, being few in number, is much more easily controlled by improper influences than all the people themselves.

I do not want to discuss that subject now, Mr. President, but I wish to state for the State of Mississippi that she has been made the target of attack unceasingly by people who do not understand her constitution, some of whom have never read that constitution and are not acquainted with its provisions and still less know of its working.

Before the constitution of Mississippi was framed, if the Senator will examine the vote of Mississippi, he will find that the vote had diminished; and he will find also, if he will consult the last census, that in the decade just passed Mississippi increased her population over 20 per cent, as against 14 per cent in the decade from 1880 to 1890. Yet this constitution is the work of 1890, which so disfranchised, you would have us to believe, a majority of the people of that State; and yet people have poured into it, and they are of that character which the Senator has in mind when he says the people have been disfranchised. The white people of Mississippi, its energetic young men, have sought new fields, where more glittering prizes tempted them, in the far West, in the Middle West, in the North, and some in the Northeast. But the colored people from the older States have constantly come to Mississippi, to be oppressed and downtrodden and denied the rights of citizens.

Every citizen is not a voter. Women are citizens, children are citizens, even corporations are citizens in some respects.

Now, I will give the Senator what the registered vote of Mississippi is. It is 125,571. That is a majority of the voters of the State. So he is mistaken in the assertion that they have been disfranchised by the constitution, or the operation of the constitution in the hands of the officers of the State. It has not been manipulated. There are 128,000 names on the polls, and every newspaper in Mississippi published, as I said, lists of those who did not think enough of the franchise to pay their poll tax of $2 in February in order that they might vote in November.

So little do they value the responsibilities and the privileges, much less the duties of citizenship, that they are willing to let it all go out of their hands for the paltry sum of $2. If there is a man on the top of this globe, a citizen of a self-governing republic like ours, who has not enough pride in the institutions of his country, who has not enough respect for himself to pay $2 that he may have the privilege of a free man in helping to control the destiny of the country, in all conscience let him do without the vote, and the body politic will be healthier for that self exclusion from its deliberations. It need not trouble anybody afar off to come to Mississippi and talk about remedying her evils. We are quite capable of taking care of ourselves.

Now, I wish to state the registration in 1896. I have not a later one. The vote in 1900 was only 51,000 out of a registration of 125,000. The reason I gave a few moments ago is perfectly evident to everyone who has visited the State or knows anything about it; but we are so apt to talk, Mr. President, in this Chamber of things we know nothing about, because it offers such an illimitable field and it is so easy for the imagination of the orator to soar when untrammelled by any knowledge of facts, and we can discourse eloquently upon anything we do not understand.

I was stating the registration in Mississippi. The polls are 290,210. That means the polls of people 21 years of age, made without regard to criminals or paupers, idiots, or anything else. The registration is 125,000.

When this question comes before the Senate to be discussed at large I may have something to say about it. I did not intend to say anything. I am going to vote for it simply because the people of this country desire it. I do not desire it particularly. I could get along either way as far as I am personally concerned, but there is evidently a desire on the part of the people of the Union, irrespective of sections, manhood suffrage, woman suffrage, any sort of suffrage, qualified or unqualified suffrage, to change the constitutional mode of electing Senators. It is not the States of the South that have been asking for it. The State of Mississippi has not asked for this change, and there are a great many others in her category of invective and denunciation so frequently heard here who have not asked for it. But the demand is from the States where there is no negro population. They are the people who ask for an election of Senators by the people. They are Republican States.

Why do they ask it, Mr. President? Because they are dissatisfied with the men whom the legislatures of those States have sent. If they had been satisfactory to their constituents there would not be this clamor for a change in the mode of electing Senators and transferring that duty from the legislature of the State to the sovereign people of the State. If all had been fair and smooth to the people of those States there would have been no effort made to pass memorials and resolutions in State legislatures and bring in propositions to amend the Constitution in this respect. The proposition does not come from my section of the country, but from another.

Whether the people of this country shall have their way or not depends, of course, upon the action of the Senate. I do not know that the measure is going to carry. I only know what I will do myself. I do not care what other people do. It is very immaterial to me personally, as far as my political fortunes are concerned, what the Senate does about it; but at any rate the people of the United States, if we can trust them in every form in which they can manifest their wish, desire to have this change made; and no one yet found, until the eloquent Senator from New York arose yesterday in his place, that they are going to change the character of the representation here; that it was going to in any means abridge or qualify the sovereign character of the States that are represented, or that the duties would be changed, or that we would have two Houses of Representatives and no Senate, or a unicameral legislature instead of one a bicameral. I think the fears of the Senator are not well founded. When his amendment comes before the Senate there will doubtless be very instructive reasons given by the Senator for propounding his amendment and there will doubtless be a sufficient answer in opposition to it.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I did not intend to fully discuss this question until it came before the Senate on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I have the honor to be a member. I proposed the amendment yesterday in order that it might get before the Senate and before the country, so that we could have a discussion of this question, which we never have had before.

Legislatures have, it is true, passed resolutions in favor of the proposed amendment of the Constitution but they have passed them, as a rule, in a pro forma manner, without any discussion in the legislatures and without any discussion in the press of the different States. The joint resolution itself, which is now before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, passed the House of Representatives without any discussion whatever. It passed the House of Representatives upon a general consent by those who favored and those who opposed it that they would unload the whole question on the Senate, which was the body most affected.

Here is an amendment proposed to the Constitution which, in my judgment, opens Pandora's box for amendments to the Constitution of the United States, the end of which no man can see; and yet this amendment, proposing so radically to change the conditions under which our Government has existed and our legislation has been enacted for one hundred and fifteen years, passed the popular branch of Congress without a single discussion upon it or any reason given for or against it.

My eloquent friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has in his speech, which I have listened to with great pleasure, taken issue upon the question whether there should be an equal vote of the citizens of the United States for United States Senators if they are to be elected by popular suffrage. If Senators of the United States are to be elected by popular suffrage, then the whole question of the tenure of their place here will be called up every time their certificates are presented.

Now, the Senate does not go behind the legislature to find how it was elected. It has been decided that it can not do that. But when the Senator from Mississippi comes here by a popular vote, as I trust he will, if this amendment is adopted, the Senate will want to know whether the people of his State who are citizens under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution have had the right to vote for or against him, and if they find that the citizens who are by the Constitution of the United States declared to be citizens, who for thirty-five years have had the right to suffrage in his State, have by device and subterfuge and a scheme been deprived of that suffrage the Senator will have a hard road to travel when he takes his seat in this body.

The Senator sneers at manhood suffrage. He speaks with contempt of the 1,500,000 citizens who cast their votes in the State of New York. He says that they are controlled by trusts and controlled by corporations. It is the pride of the State of New York that she puts no restriction whatever upon the native-born or naturalized citizen who has reached 21 years of age and has the possession of his faculties. We have found no difficulty in our State growing out of legislation by members elected to our senate and our house of assembly and our governors who have reached their position by this manhood suffrage.

This is a disagreeable question. I dislike exceedingly to go into it. I have no disposition to interfere with the local affairs of Mississippi or any other Southern State. I do not propose nor would I stand here for one minute for what is called the force bill, reaching every part of the suffrage of the Southern States in their local matters. But when the people of the United States are to elect Senators by the people of the State doing it, then the men who cast their manhood vote in the State of New York want to know whether people equally entitled with themselves have cast a manhood vote under similar circumstances in the State of Mississippi.

Notwithstanding the exceedingly ingenious and the exceedingly able explanation given by the Senator from Mississippi, everybody knows that there is no fairness in the tests which are provided by the constitution of that State for the registration of voters. The canvassing board are all of one party. The canvassing board are selected for one purpose—to prevent the negro from voting, no matter what his intelligence may be; to prevent the negro from being registered, no matter what his intelligence may be.

And what is the device? Twenty or 50 or 100 white men who can not read, who can not write, and who do not know whether the constitution is the Constitution of the United States or of the State of Mississippi or of their own bodies, are not asked the question, because their grandfathers voted. That qualifies them to vote. But a negro comes up who is a graduate of Yale College and who does understand the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Mississippi. He has passed through Columbia College or Harvard Law School.

This registration board ask him if he can read. "Yes." "Can you write?" "Yes." "Do you understand the Constitution of the United States?" "I do; I have learned it by heart." "Do you understand the constitution of the State of Mississippi?" "I do; I know it by heart." "Well, you must construe it intelligently. Construe that section;" and that construction never can satisfy that registration board, and he is disfranchised. That is the kind of a vote which would send United States Senators to this body. That is the kind of an agitation which would be precipitated into this Chamber. That is the kind of a controversy which would take up the whole time of the Senate in deciding who were entitled to vote.

Why, Mr. President, suppose a Senator came here from Kentucky, elected under the Goebel law, upon the facts as proved at the time that Governor Beckham was seated by a returning board who themselves admitted that his opponent, Taylor, had a majority. What was that case? After throwing out 28,000 votes, Taylor still had a majority, according to a Democratic returning board, of 2,800; and then the legislature declared that he was not entitled to his seat because, under the Goebel law, they had the right to say so, no matter what the vote. Under that Goebel law a returning board in the State of Kentucky could send here a Senator by a less vote than his opponent had a majority.

All I propose, Mr. President, is that a State in the election of a United States Senator and a member of the House of Representatives, and in no other case can not do such a thing. If we are to change the method of the election of Senators to this body, then this body must be kept pure by the electorate being upon the same basis in one State as in another, and the electors of the States themselves standing for the man who comes here to fill the high function of representing his State in the Senate.

My eloquent friend from Mississippi says what difference would it make, because substantially the same people would come here from the Southern States by the people as now come here by the action of our legislature and our primaries. I will tell you what difference it would make. If there was manhood suffrage there would be here Republican Senators from Virginia; there would be here Republican Senators from Kentucky if they had a proper election law in Kentucky. If there was manhood suffrage the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], who has been sent here twice, would be sent here again.

There was no fear of negro domination in the State of North Carolina. There was no complaint of the negro debauching the suffrage or of debauching the laws or of debauching the legislature in the State of North Carolina. Then why did the North Carolina Democracy put a clause in the constitution of that State excluding the negro from voting? In order to keep Senator PRITCHARD out of the Senate when his term expires, and for no other purpose whatever, and in order to elect a Democrat in the place of the Populist Senator Butler, and for no other purpose whatever.

Now, my friend from Mississippi says that there are 125,000 registered voters in the State of Mississippi. Well, those 125,000 registered voters in the State of Mississippi do not represent more than one-half of those who would be entitled to vote if the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution were in force, and living and vital force, in that Commonwealth. But with 125,000 registered voters in a Presidential election, with Bryan running on one side, representing the gospel of Mississippi, and with McKinley running on the other side, representing the gospel of patriotism and of good government, which was an issue to call out the vote, it called out only 55,000 votes in the Presidential election—55,000 out of 125,000.

Where were the 70,000? Why were they not in evidence in the great Presidential election that the whole world was interested in? They were not in evidence because the election laws of the State of Mississippi, the constitution of the State of Mississippi, the returning boards of the State of Mississippi had fixed the election in that State before the vote was cast and the voting was a farce. I do not propose, nor do I believe, that there is a Senator on this side of the Chamber who proposes that 55,000 voters out of 125,000 registered and 100,000 more deprived of the right of suffrage shall send two Senators to this body to legislate, as against the manhood suffrage of the States which we represent.

My friend, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, says this is a popular demand, and the voting is to be done by the great body of the people instead of by the people whom they may elect to the legislature for this purpose.

Why, Mr. President, we all know what the difference would be if we could meet in town meetings, as they do in the towns of New England. If we could meet in general assemblies, as the people did on the great plain at Athens, then I would say, "Amen; it is the popular voice; it is the vox populi; it is the voice of God."

But if we adopt the proposed constitutional amendment, what does the Senator propose to substitute for the legislature elected by the people, with the candidates all before them, elected upon this issue in every assembly district, as it was when I ran for the Senate, with the people of the entire State and the whole press canvassing for a month before the election and canvassing for a month after the election, until the legislature decide on the qualifications, the ability, and the patriotism of the men who are the candidates for this great place? He proposes that this question shall be relegated to the party conventions.

Under our political system there is no other way of getting at such matters but by a State convention, composed of a thousand members, elected by all sorts of process, and some of them by no process whatever, meeting for one day, not knowing one another, not acquainted with one another, having no responsibilities in the way of a record of their votes, having no responsibilities in the oath of office, keeping no record to go back before the people, trading here and there in order that one locality may have a governor, another a lieutenant-governor, another a commissioner of canals, another a State-prison inspector, and another a judge—that body, sitting for one day, selecting a United States Senator as against the process which is now in vogue, the people having no choice, because the convention of one party selects a candidate for United States Senator for whom the people of one party are to vote and a similar convention selects a candidate to be voted for by the people of the other party. The people have no choice as to what they shall do except to take one or the other of the candidates presented for their suffrages.

Mr. President, there is just this one question, which I will not discuss, but it has been discussed with great ability and power by the Senator from Mississippi, and that is the possibility of changing the character of this body by admitting Senators here from the different States based upon the population of the States. I did say in my brief remarks yesterday that revolutions never go backward, and I repeat it. I did say in my remarks yesterday that the people will have their way, and if you once break down the existing principle in their mind, and they come to think that the election of Senators is their matter and not the matter of the sovereign States, the next step will be that they and not the States will control the Senate.

I submit to the Senator, and I submit to the very many eminent lawyers in the Senate this question. It is true that in the Constitution there is a clause that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." It is true that provision is in the Constitution; but if we begin by having Senators elected by the people, instead of having them elected as now, by the legislatures, with the whole of the people understanding that in that way the corporate body, the sovereignty of the State, is represented in the United States Senate, we at once start the question of the inequalities between the several States, for the people themselves will take up that question; and then we shall find entering into every canvass for United States Senator in every State the fact that 23 States, casting 2,363,000 votes, have a majority in this body, and can deprive 22 States, casting 11,600,000 votes, of what they want, what they demand, and what they are unanimously in favor of.

Every year a proposition is presented to Congress for basing representation in the Senate upon population, on the ground that the people must have their way; every year it is voted down; and yet in every succeeding year it comes up and receives more votes. Why? It receives more votes because in the political emergencies of a great State the enmities, the divisions, the rivalries among party leaders are so great that, in order to preserve party harmony and secure party success, these leaders must be pacified, and they are pacified by the promise, "When New York gets 14 Senators, or 12 Senators, or 10 Senators, or 6 Senators, or whatever the basis may be, then we will take care of you." It will not be a decade before, on that principle, there will be 34 of these greater States voting here for this constitutional amendment and adopting it in their several States.

Now comes for my friends, the lawyers and judges, a very hard nut to crack. Those 34 States elect those Senators; they come here, and they are sworn into this body, which is the judge of the qualifications of its own members. Who is to put them out? How are you going to get the question before the Supreme Court of the United States? How is the Supreme Court of the United States going to make effective upon this body any rule which it may adopt? You are at once opening the door for the wildest and the widest revolution which has been suggested since the Constitution of the United States was adopted, in 1787.

It is an extraordinary thing about that Constitution that its primary character has never been changed; that no amendment has been added to it in one hundred and fifteen years which has affected anything respecting its organic principles relating to the executive, legislative, and the judicial branches of the Government. All the amendments added to it have related to matters of detail or to matters of suffrage.

Mr. President, I have been betrayed into a much longer discussion than I expected. I was surprised to hear my friend the Senator from Mississippi claiming that the legislatures of most of the States which elected Senators by manhood suffrage, where manhood suffrage elected the legislature, are controlled by corporations and trusts, but that in the States where the full suffrage is suppressed the corporations and trusts have no power.

Thank God, Mr. President, the people of the State of New York can deal with corporations and with trusts in their own sweet way, just as they like. There is no charge in that State by the representatives of either party but what the corporations and the trusts are controlled by the people. The people tell the legislature what to do with them, and the legislature carries out that will, and the corporations and the trusts are powerless. There is no charge even in the most radical paper, even in the most yellow of the yellow journals—if that means anything, and I do not think it does—but that the legislature of the State of New York represents the people who elected its members, the people voting for them upon manhood suffrage, and represents no one else.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2960, known as the Chinese-exclusion bill.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair). The Chair would state that the Senator can only proceed at this time by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. MONEY. Then I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PENROSE. For what purpose?

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, because I desire to reply to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEWEY].

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I must insist on my motion that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the Chinese-exclusion bill. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] who has the floor has been waiting patiently to address the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi when I take the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the Chinese-exclusion bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a minute or two?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield, if I have the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I think, has the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has not yet been acted upon. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LOUD, Mr. SMITH of Illinois, and Mr. SWANSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the request for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MASON, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. CLAY were appointed.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have two or three telegrams in reference to the pending bill, which I should like to have read. I think the Senator from Colorado will be glad to hear them read.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the Senator does that, and because it may precipitate a running discussion, I should like to ask at this time if the Senator from Colorado will yield to me—

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senate at this time for unanimous consent that an agreement be made that the pending bill be disposed of at 3 o'clock on Monday next, after which hour there shall be limited debate under Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall have to object to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair). Objection is made.

Mr. FORAKER. Would not Tuesday next suit the Senator as well? I understood him to say yesterday that it would. Some of us are so situated that we can not address the Senate on the bill sooner than Monday, and I have already given notice that at that time I desire to discuss the measure.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator from Ohio any suggestion to make as to the day which would be acceptable and convenient to Senators who have not yet addressed the Senate on the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. What is the inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether he would suggest a day?

Mr. FORAKER. I have suggested Tuesday.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, I will ask for an agreement that a vote be taken on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggested that because I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say on yesterday that Tuesday would be acceptable to him.

Mr. PENROSE. After which hour there shall be debate on the amendments already offered and to be offered, limited under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday at 3 o'clock general debate shall cease on the pending bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not see the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] here, and I do not think we should agree to that in his absence.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Vermont has no objection to this agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand he has no objection.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the matter had better be postponed until the Senator from Vermont comes in.

Mr. PENROSE. The only trouble about postponing action upon the question now is that there is a reasonably full Senate present.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] will not stop the agreement. There is great anxiety to get this bill voted on and out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his objection?

Mr. ELKINS. I should rather have the Senator from Vermont present. Some one sent word to me to make a request for the Senator that an agreement as to taking the vote should not be made in his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia objects.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have in my hand, Mr. President, two telegraphic dispatches addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate, which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 10, 1902.

Senator WILLIAM P. FRYE.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Great injury will be done United States vessel owners if Clark's amendment is passed in Senate not only to vessels now running to Orient from Pacific, but to new proposed lines if subsidy bill passes. This business is growing and should not be hampered.

ALFRED WINSOR,

Pres. Boston S. S. Co. and Boston Tow Boat Co.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 9, 1902.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,

Chairman Committee on Commerce,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The amendment to the Chinese-exclusion bill adopted by House yesterday prohibiting employment of Chinese on American vessels engaged in foreign trade will be disastrous to American shipping engaged in oriental commerce. If it becomes a law it will without question force every American ship on the Pacific trading to the Orient to sail under a foreign flag. While doing incalculable harm to American shipping, the amendment does no good to anybody.

THOMAS BURKE,

Chairman of Committee on National Affairs, Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to have two other telegrams read, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1902.

ROBERT H. SWAYNE,

Care Swayne, Hoyt & Co., San Francisco:

James R. Dunn has read a statement before Senate Immigration Committee, as follows:

"I am informed upon absolutely credible authority (here I will state that I will give to the chairman of this committee, if desired, the name of my informant, which, however, I will not divulge in this public meeting) that a prominent San Franciscan, personally favorable to the admission of Chinese, called the attention of the general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to the possibility of 'bringing over' large numbers of Chinese laborers in the guise of merchants, students, teachers, and travelers. It appears that until then this generous provision of the law had been virtually ignored by the promoters of Chinese immigration. After very careful consideration by the representatives of the steamship company the scheme was put in operation and agents were sent to China for the purpose of working up the business. Chinese laborers were provided with certificates as merchants, students, etc., and the Chinese passenger traffic grew to immense proportions. For some two or three years the business thrived. The collectors of customs looked upon these certificates as absolute evidence of the right of the applicants to admission, and they were admitted after little or no investigation."

Dunn now gives your name as his informant, and says that you told him that you advised me as to the possibilities of bringing over large numbers of Chinese laborers in the guise of merchants, students, teachers, and travelers. Please wire me at once over your signature whether this statement of Dunn's is true or not.

R. P. SCHWERIN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 9, 1902.

R. P. SCHWERIN,

New Willard, Washington:

Replying to your telegram 9th, please deny for me without qualification Mr. Dunn's statement. It is not true that I ever told him that I advised you as to the possibilities of bringing over large numbers or any number of Chinese laborers in the guise of merchants, students, and travelers, nor have I ever suggested such an idea to anyone at any time. I will be glad to put this in the form of an affidavit if desired.

ROBT. H. SWAYNE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM entered the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] being now present, on whose behalf the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] requested that the effort to secure a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the Chinese-exclusion bill be suspended, I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont whether next Tuesday at 3 o'clock will be an hour suitable to his convenience to vote upon the bill?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Any time will be suitable to me, but there are several Senators on the floor who have expressed to me a desire to have Wednesday fixed as the time for voting. Whether they want to be heard or not I do not know. Personally I am perfectly willing to vote at any time, and have no objection to fixing upon Wednesday as the time.

Mr. PENROSE. If Wednesday will suit the Senator better, I will make the request that the time for voting on the pending bill be fixed at 3 o'clock on that day, debate to proceed thereafter under Rule VIII.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he fix an earlier hour than 3 o'clock, in view of the suggestion of the five-minute debate; that is, provided it is his purpose to complete the bill on Wednesday.

Mr. LODGE. That is the agreement proposed.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator's suggestion an excellent one, and I will accept any hour he will indicate.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that the voting commence at 1 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. I will modify my request then, Mr. President, to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on next Wednesday at 1 o'clock general debate on the pending bill shall cease, and that thereafter debate on the bill shall proceed under the five-minute rule, the voting to begin at that time on the amendments already offered or which may be offered up to that time—

Mr. ALLISON. Or that may be offered at any stage.

Mr. PENROSE. Thereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At any stage, and that the final vote be taken before adjournment on that day. Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that 2 o'clock will be a more suitable time. That will give us nearly two hours if any Senator wishes to speak.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I will say at the end of the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not specially object, but I know there are a great number of amendments to this bill, and there probably will be more, and therefore ample time should be given for brief debate, so as to have the final vote taken before midnight. I do not know that there will be a long debate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, most of the amendments are already before the Senate, I presume, and they will be debated, I think, with the bill. I am not going to make any objection to 1 o'clock if the Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement, then, as stated by the Chair, will stand, 1 o'clock on next Wednesday being the hour at which general debate upon the bill shall cease and the voting commence.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to modify the amendment which I proposed last evening, and I think it is only fair to the Senator from Colorado that it should be done before he speaks. I suppose I have a right to modify it.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator had done it last night and it had been printed, it would have been a good deal more convenient to me. But I will listen to it. I should like to know what the modification is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That all laws now in force prohibiting and regulating the coming of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent into the United States, and the residence of such persons therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect until the 7th day of December, 1904, and so long as the treaty between China and the United States concluded on the 17th day of March, 1894, and proclaimed by the President on the 8th day of December, 1894, shall continue in force.

SEC. 2. That in case said treaty be terminated, as provided in article 6 thereof, this act, and the acts hereby extended and continued, shall remain in force until there shall be concluded between the United States and China a new treaty respecting the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and until appropriate laws shall be passed to carry into effect the provisions thereof.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to make and prescribe, and from time to time to change, such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper to execute the provisions of this act, and of the acts hereby extended and continued, and of said treaty of December 8, 1894, and, with the approval of the President, to appoint such agents as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of said treaty and said acts.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me? I want to correct some statements made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. TELLER. I think under the circumstances I will have to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. I shall be very brief.

Mr. TELLER. I will resume the floor when the Senator from Mississippi gets through.

▲ ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I am very greatly obliged to the courtesy of the Senator from Colorado for permitting me to have a few moments which I could not obtain from the Senator in charge of the bill.

I do not intend to reply to the speech of the Senator from New York, but to correct some statements of fact which I know he would not have made if he had been acquainted with the facts. The Senator stated that the voters of the State of Mississippi were voting under an organization, a device, a scheme, which was intended to defraud them of their right to vote. He said that there were managers of elections, commissioners of registry, and a returning board composed all of members of the same party, and that when the grandfather clause came up only the whites were permitted to vote and the blacks were denied the right to vote. He said a certain colloquy—which exists only as a figment of his brain, it never having occurred in the State—took place at the polls which excluded some and included others who were really disqualified. As a matter of fact, if the Senator had taken the least pains to investigate the constitution and laws of Mississippi he never would have made these useless statements to the Senate. I understand very well that so honorable and distinguished a gentleman would not willfully misstate the facts, but he has carelessly done so.

There is no such thing as he imagines of organization or scheme in Mississippi. There is no returning board of the State. The boards of managers of elections and of registration, according to the laws of Mississippi, can not be composed all of members of the same party, as he states here, but, on the contrary, just the reverse. The commissioners of election are named by the governor of the State, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general of the State. Sometimes they are Republicans and sometimes they are Democrats in the State of Mississippi, just as I have seen Democratic Senators from and Democratic governors in the great State of New York. The law and the constitution stand there without regard to the party that enforces them. So these three officers of the State are the board ex officio which names each one of the county boards of commissioners of registration, and they can not be composed of members of the same party. These name the managers of election at each voting precinct of the State, and they can not be composed, as I say, of members of the same party nor can the clerks and judges of election or the managers. That is the condition.

As to the grandfather clause, the Senator overlooked the fact that there is no such provision in the constitution of Mississippi. Therefore it can not operate, and there is no grandfather business about it. He has mistaken the constitution of the State of Mississippi for the constitution of Louisiana and the constitution of North Carolina, which have clauses commonly called the grandfather clauses. I think it can be proved very conclusively, and I will undertake to do it when the proper time comes, that the grandfather clause is not objectionable to the Constitution in any of its amendments.

As to the device or scheme which he says is intended to disfranchise the people of the State of Mississippi, it has stood the test of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Williams v. The State of Mississippi, and the Supreme Court has the misfortune to differ with the learned Senator from New York as to the constitutionality of that scheme or device, as he has denominated it.

Mr. BATE. The Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MONEY. I said the Supreme Court of the United States—both the supreme court of Mississippi and the Supreme Court of the United States.

As to my sneering at the manhood suffrage of New York, he is mistaken. If I left such an impression upon his mind, I hope to disabuse him of it as speedily as possible. I have the greatest respect for the suffrage of the whole people, and I recognize the wisdom of the legislature which disqualifies as electors for any office the vicious and the criminal, and I might say those so careless of their education and of their property that they can not pay a poll tax and can not read. But the State of Mississippi even modifies what he seemed to consider a harsh rule by providing that where a man could not read, if he was only able to understand that which was read to him he is permitted to register.

Now, as I said, I have so much respect for the manhood suffrage of the State of New York that I am perfectly willing to leave to that manhood suffrage the election of Senators to represent that great State in this honorable body. But the Senator who has such respect for the suffrage of the people is unwilling to trust that very people to elect him to the seat he occupies here, if what he says to-day may be taken for his real opinion upon that subject.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a minute or two to read from the constitution of the State of Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for that purpose.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I wish to read the section of the constitution of Mississippi in reference to the elections and the qualifications of electors to which my colleague has referred. Section 240 is very brief, and reads as follows:

All elections by the people shall be by ballot.

Section 241 reads:

Every male inhabitant of this State, except idiots, insane persons, and Indians not taxed, who is a citizen of the United States, 21 years old and upwards, who has resided in this State two years, and one year in the election district, or in the incorporated city or town in which he offers to vote, and who is duly registered as provided in this article, and who has never been convicted of bribery, burglary, theft, arson, obtaining money or goods under false pretenses, perjury, forgery, embezzlement or bigamy, and who has paid, on or before the 1st day of February of the year in which he shall offer to vote, all taxes which may have been legally required of him, and which he has had an opportunity of paying according to law, for the two preceding years, and who shall produce to the officers holding the election satisfactory evidence that he has paid said taxes, is declared to be a qualified elector; but any minister of the gospel in charge of an organized church shall be entitled to vote after six months' residence in the election district if otherwise qualified.

That is section 241 of the constitution. That constitution was adopted on the 1st day of November, 1890. Then there is a provision in order to enable those who can not read to have time to prepare themselves for the discharge of the duties of an elector. There is another provision, which is contained in section 244 of the constitution and is as I read:

On and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1892, every elector shall, in addition to the foregoing qualifications, be able to read any section of the constitution of this State; or he shall be able to understand the same when read to him or give a reasonable interpretation thereof. A new registration shall be made before the next ensuing election after January the 1st, A. D. 1892.

Now, then, by that section he is required either to be able to read the constitution or to give some interpretation of it after it shall have been read to him, or any portion of it. There is no qualification of writing about it. It is only to read the constitution.

Now, the first section of the constitution which has reference to elections is section 102:

All general elections for State and county officers shall commence and be held every four years, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, until altered by law; and the electors, in all cases except in cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during their attendance at elections and in going to and returning therefrom.

Section 114 shows how the returns shall be made. It is as follows:

Returns of all elections by the people shall be made to the secretary of state in such manner as shall be provided by law.

Then section 140, or that part of it in reference to the counting or returning of votes, for it is a good long section and I will not read all of it, is as follows:

The returns of said election shall be certified by the election commissioners, or a majority of them, of the several counties and transmitted, sealed, to the seat of government, directed to the secretary of state, and shall be by him safely kept and delivered to the speaker of the house of representatives at the next ensuing session of the legislature within one day after he shall have been elected. The speaker shall, on the next Tuesday after he shall have received said returns, open and publish them in the presence of the house of representatives, and said house shall ascertain and count the vote of each county and legislative district and decide any contest that may be made concerning the same, and said decision shall be made by a majority of the whole number of members of the house of representatives concurring therein, by a viva voce vote, which shall be recorded in its journal: Provided, In case the two highest candidates have an equal number of votes in any county or legislative district, the electoral vote of such county or legislative district shall be considered as equally divided between them. The person found to have received a majority of all the electoral votes, and also a majority of the popular vote, shall be declared elected.

Section 3601 of the code of Mississippi of 1892 provides for the appointment of three election commissioners in each county, and I will read the section, as it will explain itself better than I can explain it:

There shall be a State board of election commissioners, to consist of the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general, any two of whom may perform the duties required of the board; a board of election commissioners in each county, to consist of three discreet persons who are freeholders and electors in the county in which they are to act, and who shall not all be of the same political party, if such men of different political parties can be conveniently had in the county; and a registrar in each county, who shall be the clerk of the circuit court, unless he shall be shown to be an improper person, to register the names of the electors therein.

Then section 3633 of the code provides as follows:

At the election in 1895, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor of public accounts, State treasurer, attorney-general, superintendent of public education, three railroad commissioners, land commissioner, clerk of the supreme court, senators and members of the house of representatives in the legislature, district attorneys for the several districts, clerks of the circuit and chancery courts of the several counties, as well as sheriffs, coroners, treasurers, assessors, surveyors, and members of the boards of supervisors, justices of the peace, and constables, and all other officers to be elected by the people. All such officers shall hold their offices for the term of four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified. The State officers, including railroad commissioners, land commissioner, and the clerk of the supreme court, shall be elected in the manner prescribed in section 140 of the constitution.

If I may be indulged a minute longer, to read what the State has done in providing for the education of the people of the State of both colors, white and black, in order that they may qualify themselves to become electors, I will take up just a little more of the time of the Senate to quote from the report of the State superintendent of education. The report of the superintendent of education of the State of Mississippi, Hon. Henry L. Whitfield, who is a most excellent man, a splendid educator, a man who has been in the business of teaching ever since he arrived at the years of manhood, shows that for the year 1900-1901 there attended the common schools in Mississippi, upon an average, 158,154 white and 193,588 colored children.

Those were the common schools, exclusive of separate school districts. Including the separate school districts, there was an attendance upon the schools of 179,142 white and 208,346 colored children. Provision is made for the education of the children of the State, both black and white, and there is no "grandfather" clause in our constitution, as was properly said by my colleague.

I thank the Senator from Colorado for yielding to me at this time. I hope to have, at some other time, an opportunity to say something further in reference to this matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at the time the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] made his speech, and I do not know of my own knowledge what he said with reference to the constitutional amendment which has recently been adopted in my State and with regard to the existing election laws of my State. I am informed, however, by Senators who were present, that in general terms he made the charge that this amendment and these election laws were passed for the express purpose of securing the removal of my predecessor, Senator Butler, from this Chamber, as well as the prospective purpose of removing from this Chamber my colleague, and that but for that amendment and these election laws my State would now be Republican.

I merely rise now for the purpose of saying that if the Senator from New York made these observations with respect to the purpose and object of the people of my State in adopting this amendment and with reference to the use by the Democratic party in that State of the existing election laws, he is entirely mistaken about the facts, and I do not think had he been in possession of the facts he would have made the statements which are credited to him by those who heard him.

Mr. HOAR. Permit me to call attention to the fact that the Senator from New York is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not saying anything about the Senator from New York that I think it particularly necessary for him to hear. I merely propose showing he is mistaken as to the facts. I am sorry he is not the Chamber, however.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to suggest that the Senator from New York left while this question, and this very phase of it, was under discussion. If he is not here, he knew it was being discussed. Go on.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire or intend to enter upon a general reply. I will reserve that until I have seen the remarks of the Senator.

I do wish to say now, Mr. President, that if the Senator from New York made the statement I understand he did make, to the effect that the constitutional amendment passed by my State was for the purpose of legislating Senators of the opposite party out of this Chamber and legislating Senators of my party into this Chamber, that statement has no sort of support in the facts with reference to the adoption of that amendment, because, while the amendment was adopted in August, 1901, it has not yet gone into effect, and will not go into effect until July of the present year. The next election, to be held in November of this year, will be the first election to be held in my State under that amendment.

Now, if the Senator from New York said, or meant by what he did say, that we have used the present election law and election machinery for the purpose of voting Republicans out of this Chamber and voting Democrats in this Chamber, that statement is equally unwarranted by the facts. In 1898 the opposite party in my State was in control of every department of the government.

Mr. TELLER. The Republican party?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Republican party and the Populist party in conjunction, for they were in fusion in my State. They were in control in 1898 of every department of the government of my State, and the election law under which the election of that year was held was an election law passed by the Republican and Populist legislature of 1894. So the election in that State was held under a law of their own making, with the entire election machinery in their hands, and in that election, held under these circumstances, the Democratic party carried the State by a majority of nearly 20,000. That is the way the Democratic party got into power in my State.

Again, Mr. President, if the Senator from New York meant to say or meant by what he did say that we have used the election law which we passed when we came in power in 1898 to vote out Republicans by the suppression of the colored vote of the State or any part of it, the answer and the conclusive answer to that statement is that there were polled in North Carolina in the election of 1901 a larger vote in proportion to the population over 21 years of age than was polled in a majority of the States of the Union, and there was polled for the legislature which elected me to this Chamber the largest vote ever polled in North Carolina in any election except the election of 1898, when the Democratic party overthrew the combined opposition and came back into power.

Now, Mr. President, because I do not know exactly what the Senator from New York said in reference to my State, I content myself with these general observations, reserving the right, when I have read in the RECORD what he has said, to reply to any statement I have not met and answered and which I may think requires an answer.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know, Mr. President, that I am warranted in detaining the Senate even for a moment to take any notice of the remarks made by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] so recently. I have heard the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] admonished by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that the junior Senator from New York was not in the Chamber at this time. Neither was I when he took occasion to refer to a recent election in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. HOAR. Will my honorable friend the Senator from Kentucky permit me to say a word?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I rose for no purpose of admonishing any Senator or complaining of any Senator proceeding. But I thought, as the Senator from New York had been here so recently and was not here now, that anybody who read the RECORD might possibly think he failed to answer.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think it was altogether proper.

Mr. HOAR. Therefore I wanted the fact of his absence to appear. I had no purpose of suggesting any criticism of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not so understand it, and I think it was altogether proper that the Senator from Massachusetts should have protected the Senator from New York to the extent of noting his absence from the Chamber. But the fact remains that the Senator from New York, when playing the rôle of that animal that has been so often quoted—he who disports himself after such a peculiar fashion when he gets into a china shop—did not hesitate to leave the floor of the Senate in the midst of the reply of the Senator from Mississippi.

I was absent from the Chamber for forty-five minutes by our clock, during which time he saw fit to criticise the election laws and the election processes of a number of States in this Union, it seems, but I was in this Chamber when he left it, going into his cloakroom in the middle of the reply of the Senator from Mississippi to him. It is his business to be here if he is to be protected in a controversy which he traveled out of his way to invite.

I was amazed on yesterday when the junior Senator from New York, during the transaction of morning business, sprung a premature explosion upon the Senate, probably an illustration of spontaneous combustion. He is a member of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, and so am I. The proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution making Senators elective by a direct popular vote of the people is pending in that committee.

Mr. DUBOIS. And is to be voted on at the next meeting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He knew, as well as the Senate may now know, that on last Tuesday the committee agreed to come to a final vote on that very amendment on next Tuesday. Then why the necessity for doing that which, in my somewhat extended service in the Senate, I never saw done before by anybody?

I went to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and asked him if he did not think that his colleague upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections had been guilty of a disregard of discipline in springing this bombshell, as he seemed to regard it, upon the Senate, when as petitions were being filed and bills were being offered and reports of committees were being made he saw fit to deliver himself of a speech, which, to say the least, was peculiar in more respects than one. I made no comment on it on the floor of the Senate at the time.

Mr. DEPEW entered the Chamber.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am glad to see that the junior Senator from New York has returned to the controversy that he has found necessary to provoke.

Mr. DEPEW. I returned on purpose to hear the eloquence of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I appreciate the compliment more than I may tell the Senator, and only hope that I may be able to interest him. I did not comment at that time—I will not say upon a violation of the rule—but I will say upon the unprecedented performance to which I was so fortunate as to have the opportunity of listening yesterday morning. I thought probably it was to be attributed to the fact that the Senator from New York did not know any better than to make political speeches and inject them into the transaction of morning business.

I thought he might have contained his soul in peace until next Tuesday, when he will doubtless know, when he is bound to know, what the vote on the proposed amendment shall be in the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But in the course of that speech I thought I detected the purpose that lay behind it and that actuated its deliverance, and that was to take time by the forelock and to be the first man to shape the revitalized representative of reconstruction days, to be the first man to waive the excavated bloody shirt and threaten certain Commonwealths of this great Union with a loss of representation if they dared to press the matter of this amendment any further. In the course of what that Senator had to say to-day, as I have said, he might, by looking over in this direction, have noticed that I was not in the Chamber; but I have the extended notes of the Reporter, and I find that that Senator is credited with having said this:

Why, Mr. President, suppose a Senator came here from Kentucky elected under the Goebel law, upon the facts as proved at the time—upon the facts as proved at the time that Governor Beckham was seated by a returning board who themselves admitted that his opponent, Taylor, had a majority.

I think we had better dissect this statement as we go along. I here and now offer a premium, and leave it to the claimant to determine its magnitude and character, to any man on this earth who with the aid of a search warrant will find a single solitary statement in what I have before me that is true. Either as to the law or as to the majorities, I assert that there is not a solitary truthful statement in what I have in my hand. It is all the product of an exuberant fancy with which the distinguished junior Senator from New York has long been credited.

Mr. DEPEW. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. DEPEW. I, of course, was not engaged in the controversy over that gubernatorial contest, and so I had to rely upon public prints, especially upon the reports which were in all the New York papers—Republican, Democratic, and independent—at the time. They were to the effect that the returning boards in the different counties under the Goebel law threw out 28,000—

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator is going to discuss in detail that election, I would rather he should do it in his own time than in mine.

Mr. DEPEW. As the Senator thought the statement was made from the exuberance of the imagination, I am just stating where I got my facts. They were not disputed, I may say, in New York nor by representatives of the press in Kentucky, so far as the New York papers and their Kentucky correspondents were concerned. The statement was to the effect that after the local boards had thrown out Republican counties where there were large majorities, the Democratic returning board still found that Mr. Taylor had 2,800 majority, and when they could not be moved from that decision, and I may attribute to them absolute honesty in that, the legislature reversed that without any foundation upon which to act.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me get back to the facts.

Mark, now, how a plain tale shall put you down.

I want to prove to the satisfaction of every Senator on this floor that my statement was not an exaggeration, but a conservative, truthful statement of facts when I said that there was not a solitary statement in this paper that is true. That is not the worst of it. The ignorance displayed by the statement upon this subject is more marvelous than the result to which I called attention, if that be possible.

Suppose a Senator came here from Kentucky, elected under the Goebel law.

That is not the statement of a fact; it is a supposition.

Upon the facts as proved at the time that Governor Beckham was seated by a returning board who themselves admitted that his opponent, Taylor, had a majority.

Taylor never was Beckham's opponent. The Senator from New York does not seem to have found that out. Beckham never ran against Taylor any more than he did against the Senator from New York. Beckham was not a candidate for governor.

Mr. DEPEW. He was the candidate for lieutenant-governor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Goebel was the Democratic candidate for governor and Taylor was the Republican candidate for governor. So there we see that this statement is at variance with the facts.

Governor Beckham was seated by a returning board who themselves admitted that his opponent, Taylor, had a majority.

How many, I will not say false statements, but how many mis-statements of fact there are in that I will have to employ a mathematical calculation to determine.

The Senator said that returning board admitted Taylor had a majority and that returning board seated Beckham.

Beckham never was seated by the returning board or by the legislature either, and has not up to this time been seated either by the returning board or by a legislature. That returning board never did find and never did say, and there never was a newspaper article on the face of the earth, I think, that ever did say that that board admitted that Taylor had a majority.

That returning board, as you call it, consisted of three State commissioners, and two of the three said that Taylor had a majority on the face of the returns, but that the proof submitted to the returning board was irresistible that tissue ballots were used. Probably the Senator from New York, if he is a lifelong Republican, has heard before about tissue ballots. The whole three of the returning board declared that there were more than 3,000 false tissue ballots used, and the proof was irresistible to two of the three returning board officers.

Two of the three State commissioners, for that is their description, decided that their duties were simply ministerial. They printed and published their report to the world, in which they said that Taylor did not have a majority of the votes cast according to law; that Taylor had a majority of votes if you would include all the tissue ballots which came from certain mountain counties in the State, and that those ballots should not be counted because they were not lawful, but that, as they understood it, their duties were simply ministerial, and they had no judicial function and no right to pass upon the validity of a ballot.

So with one dissenting the two controlling votes in that board of State commissioners issued certificates of election to Taylor and every other Republican candidate on the Republican State ticket. All three of these State commissioners were lifelong Democrats and men of the highest character and position, socially and politically, in my State. They all three agreed that Taylor was not fairly elected, but by a vote of two out of three they gave the certificates of election to every candidate on the Republican ticket, and coupled with it a statement over their signatures to the world that if they had been clothed with power to pass upon the validity of a ballot, Taylor and the whole Republican ticket had been defeated.

The law provided for an appeal by any party deeming himself wronged or aggrieved in a political contest. That appeal was taken and prosecuted. It was prosecuted through the courts of the State. Goebel, the candidate on the Democratic ticket for governor, was the contestant of Taylor's seat. It was not Beckham. Beckham was the candidate for lieutenant-governor on the Democratic ticket.

Goebel prosecuted his appeal against the action of this protesting State commission of election, all three of whom, as I tell you, and I will repeat it, for I want to emphasize it, were Democrats at that time. Two of them protested that they, exercising simply ministerial functions, must issue the certificates according to the plurality or majority vote as it appeared upon the returns, without the slightest regard to its validity or its fairness. They coupled with it the statement that if their duties had been other than ministerial they would have rejected the tissue ballots, which were more than enough to have changed the result and made Goebel the governor instead of Taylor. But Goebel prosecuted his appeal from the action of that board.

In the meantime the legislature met, and as it had the unquestioned right—a right which no man ever has dared to dispute, even in the realm of newspaperdom—that legislature by joint ballot, supported by a majority of all the membership of it, declared, as did the whole number of three State commissioners, that Taylor and his Republican associates upon the ticket had never been elected. That legislature declared that Goebel was the legally elected governor of the Commonwealth.

That contest was prosecuted through the State of Kentucky to and including its supreme court, which we denominate the court of appeals. The contention of the Democrats was sustained. Nor did it stop there. That contest was brought beneath the Dome of this Capitol and passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the action taken by the local courts of Kentucky was sustained and vindicated.

These are the facts, and no man who knows aught of them will dispute a single, solitary statement.

What is it that the Senator from New York is complaining about? The Goebel law, he said. Why, the Goebel law has been sustained by the supreme court of Kentucky, and that has been sustained and vindicated in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. Is it possible that the supreme courts of the Commonwealths of this Union and the Supreme Court of the United States itself must reverse their findings, change their opinions, review their own decisions, and come to learn law at the hands of a worthy distinguished and conspicuous corporation railroad attorney.

I stand upon the opinion of the supreme court of my State and upon the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think I may safely stand there with a hope of not having the underpinning knocked from beneath me by the opinions of the junior Senator from New York.

But let us go a little further:

What was that case?

He asked. What case? He has never stated a case in this connection, unless it was the supposition of a Senator coming from the State of Kentucky elected under the Goebel law.

What was that case?

Before I pass from it I would inform the Senator what he has probably neither read nor heard. If he will take up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he will find that within the last fortnight a contested-election case was brought in the other House of Congress. It was elaborately argued by three Republican members of the House Committee on Elections, three men who ought to be among the best equipped and ablest in that body because of their assignment to service on that committee, three men who I think are among the ablest and best equipped of the House membership to discuss such a question.

It was argued at length, and not one of the Republicans taking part in the discussion of that election contest, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, though the Goebel law was the very foundation of the contention, ever charged, ever said, or ever intimated that that was not a fair election law, but upon the contrary they admitted that it was.

I am not traveling out of the record. I am not referring to matters that have taken place in the other House. I am speaking of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it is printed and laid upon the desks of every Senator for his own information and instruction. Not a man who took part on the Republican side in the debate of the Rhea-Moss contest in the House ever dared to charge or to intimate that the Goebel election law was lacking in justice or wanting in fairness. How could they when the supreme court of the State had upheld it and the Supreme Court of the United States had upheld the opinion of Kentucky's court?

What was that case? After throwing out 28,000 votes Taylor still had a majority, according to a Democratic returning board, of 2,800.

I wish the junior Senator from New York would tell me (for I have no idea that it would be a matter of interest to anybody else in this Chamber) his authority for the statement that 28,000 votes were thrown out and still a Democratic returning board found Taylor with a majority of 2,800.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President—

Mr. BLACKBURN. His figures are suspiciously alike. It is either 2,800 or 28,000, and it does not seem to matter much to the Senator from New York which.

Mr. DEPEW. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. DEPEW. I have just been informed that in order to elect Goebel one-third of the vote of the State was thrown out. Is that true?

Mr. BLACKBURN. As true as these other statements, for there is not an atom of truth in either.

Mr. DEPEW. Was the city of Louisville thrown out?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was not; nor was it necessary, to elect Goebel, to throw out the city of Louisville.

The Senator from New York is now trying to shift his ground, and I am perfectly content to have him do it, for nothing would please me better than to go through the whole and every phase of that contest, for the action of the Democratic party is absolutely impregnable, either upon the one line or the other.

Now, as I am engaged, so far as that saying is concerned, in performing the duties of an instructor here this morning upon a recent Kentucky election, let me tell him that there were certain mountain counties which sent down tissue ballots, which used them, and the duplicates and some of the originals were preserved and brought down and put in evidence in this contest. Certain mountain counties used tissue ballots. The city of Louisville was not charged with using tissue ballots.

The vote of the city of Louisville was protested, but on another ground altogether, and that was because a Republican governor of the State of Kentucky, Mr. William O. Bradley, left his office in Frankfort, trampled the provisions of the constitution beneath his feet, shipped a lot of Gatling guns and collected soldiers in the city of Louisville, and issued a proclamation declaring that on that day of election he himself, in violation of the plainest mandate of the constitution, would take command of his military and take charge of the polls of the city of Louisville.

That is not permissible in Kentucky except when a Republican administration is in power. Kentucky was admitted into the Union in June, 1792, and from that day down until now it never has been afflicted with a Republican administration but once, and that is the time the constitution was defied and trampled under foot, because it provides that whenever the military is needed for the preservation of order or the maintenance of law that military officer shall report to a civil officer, and names them in the order of succession. He shall report to the county judge; he shall report to the sheriff; and if he can not find either he shall report to the coroner, and he shall be under their orders and command.

This Republican governor of the State of Kentucky issued a proclamation and published it in the newspapers that on that election morning he would be in Louisville personally in command of the troops, and he was; and he paraded the streets with Gatling guns, I presume to show the citizen that it was safe for him to come out and vote. When the Democratic laboring man of the city of Louisville saw Governor Bradley at the head of his State guards with Gatling guns, whether double shot or not I do not know, parading and tramping the streets of that metropolis, do you know that every Democrat felt absolutely safe in his right of suffrage? That was the ground on which the vote of Louisville was contested.

But it was not necessary to throw out the vote of Louisville to defeat the Republican ticket and elect the Democratic ticket. All you had to do was to throw out tissue ballots, which all three of that board the Senator terms a returning board declared to be fraudulent, invalid, and unlawful, or if they wanted to let the Republicans count all the tissue ballots that the mountain people had used you might let them all in; and if you excluded the vote of the city of Louisville, which was controlled by Bradley's gatling guns and military, that defeated the Republican ticket and elected the Democratic ticket.

Now, look at the registration and the vote in the city of Louisville. In Kentucky, cities of that class must register its voters. They did register, and the registration showed a given number two weeks before the day of election. On the day of election those people who had thought enough of their right of suffrage to take the trouble and leave their business and go to the registration booths and register their rights did not vote by 10,000.

You may say that Bradley and his State guard and his Gatling guns furnished no explanation of their change of purpose. Of course, I can not prove that that did it. I state the facts. I say that the vote on that election day fell more than 10,000 short of the registration of two weeks before.

But however that may be, there stand the facts. Never did a Democratic board of election commissioners, never did a Democratic returning board, as the Senator prefers to designate it, never did a member of that board ever report, conclude, or decide that Mr. Taylor was elected or had a majority of the lawful ballots cast in that election. But the Senator says:

After throwing out 23,000 votes—

Well, it is not I who challenge that statement; the figures, the facts, the truth, challenge the statement—

Taylor still had a majority, according to a Democratic returning board, of 2,800—

There is just the same foundation for that statement that I find for the other—and then the legislature declared that he was not entitled to his seat—

If that was a substantive statement, if that was a sentence in itself, I would greet it with acclaim of joy and satisfaction, for it would be the first statement of a fact that I have discovered in this paper; but it is not. I have just gotten to a comma and the truth is all extracted before I can reach a period—and then the legislature declared that he [Taylor] was not entitled to his seat—because under the Goebel law they had the right to say so, no matter what the vote.

Why?—

It goes without saying that the truth does not appear in that statement.

Under that Goebel law a returning board in the State of Kentucky could send a Senator here by a less vote than his opponent had a majority.

That is such an admirable, delightful mixture and confusion of things possible and things impossible that I hardly know how to take hold of it. The legislatures do not send Senators here by a majority less than an opponent's majority. There can not be a very big majority in the vote by which any State sends a man to the United States Senate. The time may come when there can be, as I hope that time will come.

Mr. DEPEW. That is the time of which I was speaking.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the time will come; but under our present system a Senator is elected by a vote of the legislature, and I take it that on an average 100 or 150 constitute the membership of a State legislature. The number is less than 150 in my State. A man is very lucky if he gets into the Senate at all from Kentucky, but infinitely fortunate if he can get here by a majority which you can count on the fingers of your two hands. So I can not understand what that statement is intended to convey. It certainly conveys no meaning to the average mind.

Mr. DEPEW. If the Senator will permit me, when the time comes that the election of Senators is directly by the people, then the result in Kentucky will be what I said if the Goebel law is in force and if we do not have the elections supervised by United States officials.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, now I can understand. I suggested as much before. The Senator is anticipating the adoption of the constitutional amendment, which seems to be disturbing his dreams at night.

I have stated the facts cursorily, but fairly, I think, in connection with that law which the Senator criticises, or, rather, the results of which law do not seem to meet his approval. I think the Senator is unnecessarily alarmed and is needlessly disturbed as to the dire results that are to follow the adoption of this proposed constitutional amendment. It is not going to bring the Dome of this Capitol toppling about our ears; it is not going to make wreck and havoc of the whole structure of constitutional government as handed down to us by the fathers.

I do not believe that it would produce a ripple on the surface, though I do not intend to follow the Senator's example and discuss that amendment in advance of its submission to the Senate; but I would suggest to him, just by way of panacea to quiet the Senator's nerves, to soothe him into a condition of peaceful rest and slumber, if such a thing can be accomplished, that probably his difficulty might be obviated, as he contemplates, with hair on end, the adoption of the amendment making Senators elective by the popular vote, and that all his troubles might be avoided and his disquietude might be gotten over if he would suggest—and if he will do it, I will take it under profound and prayerful consideration, both in committee and in the Senate, with a view of trying, if I can, to gain the consent of my confrères to help him in the effort—he might be reconciled to a constitutional amendment, I take it, that changed the present method and mode of electing United States Senators by making an exception in the case of New York and allowing her railroads, or even the New York Central Railroad, not to be deprived of its right of naming at least one Senator who shall come from the Empire State to the councils of the nation.

I thank the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] for his courtesy.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate in reply to the remarks of my eloquent and distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

I had not the accurate knowledge of Kentucky politics and of the methods in that State which he has, and, necessarily, I had to take my information from the public prints. My criticism was based simply upon the fact that these results would follow in the case of Kentucky, if I understood the Goebel law and its action, in case there was an election of United States Senators by the people; and therefore I contended that if there was an election of United States Senators by the people, there should be a Federal election law under which the people could vote under conditions in all the States where the Senate would know who were the electorate upon whose suffrage Senators took their seats in this body.

So far as my being a railroad lawyer is concerned, I am happy to say that I have been one for thirty-six years; and I am very proud of my record in connection with the railways of this country as a railway lawyer, as a railway president, as a railway director, and as a railway worker. I have 1,000,000 associates in that honorable profession. All of us are proud of the connection and feel that it is quite as honorable as that in which any other citizen is engaged. We feel that it is quite as honorable to be in the service of the railways of the country in one capacity and another as it is to take retainers from the railways of the country, as the lawyers, who are not on the railway pay rolls, do in order to advocate or defend their causes.

In reference to the electorate of the State of New York, I will say that I am just as ready to submit my claims to that electorate as I am to submit them to the legislature. I was not a candidate to come here, except that I was made such by my party in all the platforms during the whole of the canvass, and except that when the legislature was elected every single newspaper in the State of New York of all parties, save one, and of all denominations and all religions, save one, asked the legislature to send me to this body. I had as lief submit my claims to sit here to the electorate of New York as to submit them to the legislature of New York. When my term expires I shall have reached a period of life when it will be exceedingly doubtful whether I shall care to come here again. So the practical question, so far as I am concerned, is not vital.

My position on this question is based not on any personal view whatever; not on any personal ambition whatever; not upon anything that is likely to happen to me, or not to happen to me, in the future, but I maintain it because I believe that in opening this door, in changing this mode of electing Senators, we are letting loose a Pandora box of amendments to the Constitution which will change the whole form of our organic laws as they were framed by the founders of the Constitution and as they have worked most admirably down to this day.

I believe that the Senate, both in its past and in its present, comes up to the highest ideals which the founders of the Constitution expected it to reach. I believe that the method of selecting United States Senators, with its time for deliberation, with the selected electors who are chosen for that purpose, has made this body to-day of such a character and conferred on it such a reputation that it commands the confidence of the people of the United States and the admiration of the world.

I want to say one thing further, though I am sorry that I am taking the time of the Senator from Colorado, but I will take just one moment more.

When in France last summer I met one of the most distinguished, if not the most distinguished, of the statesmen of France. I asked him about the stability of the French Republic, which has been threatened with overthrow by Bonapartists, by Boulangers, and by Orleanists several times in its thirty years of existence, and several times has come very near to overthrow. He said: "The safety of the Republic of France has been secured by the constitution of its senate. We felt that in the revolutionary conditions attending the elections of our deputies, with the waves of passion that were passing over the country and with the influences brought to bear at one time and another, there must be somewhere a conservative force with an electorate behind it, giving it independence, stability, and conservatism."

"So we studied your system, and we finally perfected it so that there is no man in France who is a republican, and wants the Republic to survive, who would change it. Our method is this: We have no States, and so we have divided the country into communities, in which there are a certain number of cities, villages, and municipalities, from which are elected a certain number of deputies to our lower house. We gave to the common councils and mayors of those communes, cities, and villages, and to the deputies from those districts, the power to meet in convention and to elect a senator from the district. The result was that the senator had to be a man of commanding influence; he had to be a man of distinction, one well known. It was not possible for anyone to be elected senator on a sudden impulse or without the greatest discussion and without his claims being passed upon by this electorate, and no demagogue or dangerous man could be elected. The result has been that our senate is like your Senate, a body which fearlessly and judicially meets such questions as always arise in a republic, in which somewhere must be the power to prevent the passion of a moment or the impulse of the hour overthrowing the best results of the centuries in the legislation of the republic, a power where its best traditions can be preserved intact."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it might be well now, perhaps, to consider the bill which is before the Senate, inasmuch as we have fixed a time for voting on it. [Laughter.]

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the question of the necessity for the exclusion of the Chinese, for everyone who has spoken on the subject has declared himself to be in favor of that. But I have had twenty years' experience here in this matter, and I have noticed that at all times, with a few exceptions, the declarations were always in favor of exclusion. I have noticed another fact, that those who are most vociferous in their declarations of anxiety to exclude the Chinese have rarely been able to find any bill which satisfied them so that they could vote for it. Almost invariably they carp at something in the bill. They think it is harsh; they think it is unconstitutional in some feature, and they dwell with great anxiety, as a general rule, upon the danger that will come to us in our trade and the sufferings that we shall endure if we pass this or that bill which the real friends of exclusion have proposed.

Every speech and address to the Senate that has been made on this subject during this debate has declared that this bill is extremely harsh in its provisions. The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] read to us a carefully prepared speech, in which he declared and redeclared that it was harsh in its terms, calculated to excite the animosity of China, and unnecessarily severe in its provisions; and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who addressed us in a carefully prepared written speech, also made the same statement. These statements, Mr. President, have usually been made without any reference to any particulars in the bill. Senators have complained of it in a general way, and they have complained also of the execution of the existing law. One would suppose from what has been said here that the Treasury Department, charged by law with the enforcement of these restrictive measures, has been exceedingly wicked and ugly, and that it has administered the law in such a way as to greatly outrage humanity.

Any law which is restrictive and repressive in its character, such as the pending bill, must have some severe provisions in it. It can not be enforced unless there are such provisions. No matter what nation you are dealing with, you must have provisions that will enable the officer to determine whether or not the class asking admission are entitled to admission.

Twenty years ago this Government adopted the policy of exclusion, a policy which, I think, every man who has given any attention to the subject must admit is a proper exercise of power, and that, too, without reference to the wishes or the will of the Empire of China.

To hear the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from New Hampshire, and some other Senators here, one would suppose that we were restricted to the making of a treaty with China, that if China did not see fit to allow us to do certain things we should be incapable of doing them. Distinguished diplomats come before the committee and declare that if we do this and that it will be a violation of the treaty. There is no violation of a treaty when we repeal a provision of it by a process of law. That is not a violation of it; it may be an abrogation of it, but we have an unquestioned right to abrogate a treaty. It is not only our right but it is our duty to abrogate a treaty when we find it bears harshly upon the American people. There can be no controversy over that. The Supreme Court settled that doctrine long ago, it is admitted by everybody, and every nation that treats with us does so with the knowledge that a treaty, when accepted, becomes the law of the land, and may be repealed, not by the executive department alone, but by the legislative and executive acting together; and all of the qualifications of the treaty that have been made by law have been made in a legal and constitutional method.

In 1868 we made a treaty with China, which we soon found was a very improper treaty, and on a bill which had passed the House of Representatives by an almost unanimous vote and had come to the Senate, 39 Senators to 27 voted deliberately to abrogate the Burlingame treaty. Among those who voted to abrogate that treaty were some of the most distinguished members of the Senate at that time, and I may say of any other time. I do not care now to read the names of the Senators who joined in voting to abrogate that treaty; but I recall very well that we were told that we would destroy our trade with China if we abrogated that treaty. Subsequently we made a treaty with China—and I am not now going into the details of this matter—but in 1894 we made another treaty, and, as stated yesterday by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], all the legislation upon the statute book was made prior to that treaty, and in that treaty China admitted this to be a proper position on our part, namely, the absolute prohibition of the immigration of the Chinese laboring classes and the admission of the excepted classes on terms that we should provide and regulate, so that no other class should get in.

I have gone over this bill with care. I have read every line of it. I have within the last five days read every statute that we have passed since 1882, and every treaty that we have made in relation to this subject; and I say here that the committee which has had this bill in charge has practically inaugurated in it the very spirit of the treaty of 1894, which is the last treaty and the treaty at present in force, together with some of the regulations which have been made by the Treasury Department. Every regulation made by that Department has been in accordance with law. Every regulation made has thus far stood the test of being in accordance with the statute and in accordance with the treaty, because the treaty is the last law upon this subject. I admit, Mr. President, that anything in the treaty inconsistent with the laws which had been before enacted would supersede those statutes.

Complaint is made of some of the regulations made by the Treasury Department; and perhaps I shall call attention to them before I get through. I am not familiar with all the regulations, because I understand that some have been made recently; but practically every regulation of any importance, those which have been published so that we could get at them, have been made after consultation with the law department of this Government, and they have the support either of the Attorney-General or of the Solicitor-General. This bill, then, is an embodiment of the law as it now stands; and I challenge any Senator who thinks that this is a cruel and harsh law to show me where it violates, if he wants to use that term, any provision of the treaty, or where it abrogates any provision of the treaty.

It must be presumed when China made a treaty of this kind with us, and put in certain provisions, such, for instance, as that a merchant might come here, that China must have known what had been the adjudications up to that time of the definition of the word "merchant." Undoubtedly she did, and to that extent the laws that were in existence, of course, entered into and became a part of the treaty so far as construing what the treaty meant. It is very evident to me that some of the Senators who have spent considerable time in making speeches have failed to read the treaties or the statutes on this subject, or, if they have read them, they have overlooked some of the very important points in them.

I wish to read from the treaty of 1894:

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of ten years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

Now, we start out, then, with the fact that for ten years China has agreed to this exclusion. It may be said that as China limited it to ten years we must wait, and if China does not agree to it we must abandon this policy. If some Senator will take that side of the question and assert it, there would be some reason perhaps in his position. But does anybody expect, does the Senator from Connecticut, who proposes to extend the statutes now in existence until the termination of the treaty in 1904, expect, that we will then abandon this doctrine of prohibition of Chinese laborers or the policy as to merchants and teachers and students and travelers, or that we will yield anything beyond what we have yielded upon the doctrine of transit across our borders from one section of the country to the other.

It is true that there are not so many Chinamen in the United States, according to the census, as there were when the treaty was made, and yet if the Treasury Department be correct, there are a great many more. I am willing to debate this matter upon the theory that we have reduced the number of Chinese in the United States, and if we have, we have reduced them under this system of ours. Does anybody believe that if we had not passed these restrictive measures and had not attempted to enforce them with great persistency and diligence there would be a decrease of the Chinese population? In every country where there is an inducement for them to go, they have gone in greater and increasing numbers every year. Our neighboring country, Canada, was compelled to pass a law prohibiting their entrance into that country, although they declined to do it when we commenced it years before. Australia and New Zealand have done the same, and where it has not been done, and where labor is well rewarded, there they have gone.

Do we not know, and does not the evidence before the committee show, that a Chinaman will pay from $300 to $500 or $600 to secure admission into this country? Why? Because he can get rich here in a few years, as riches are numbered in China. I have not any doubt, Mr. President, that if there had been no restrictive measures there would be 1,000,000 Chinamen in the United States. I believe now that if you will remove for ninety days the limitations, with the certainty that every Chinaman can come here who wants to, you will have 100,000 in ninety days if there is shipping enough to bring them here.

MR. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

MR. TELLER. Yes, sir.

MR. SPOONER. Does anybody propose to do that?

MR. TELLER. No. I believe there are a good many people in this country who wish we would, and I believe there are members of the Senate who would not sit up nights and weep very much if the bill failed and there was an interregnum of that kind.

MR. SPOONER. The Senator does not impute that to me.

MR. TELLER. Oh, no; but I know in this country there is an element that is demanding this cheap labor. I have been appealed to since this measure has been here by more than one man from the Pacific coast who said to me, "You know, Senator, we must have more labor there." A gentleman came to me the other morning and said, "We can not get hired help in our houses. We can not get help in our orchards." I said to him in reply, "No; and you never will unless we open the door and let in the Chinese until you get rid of the Chinese in your orchards and in your kitchens." You can not get the American boy, born on the Atlantic coast or in the interior, to go there and work side by side with a Chinaman. California never did herself more injury in the world than she did when she admitted the Chinaman to her borders; and if she could get rid of everyone of the Chinese she could fill their places with good American toilers or men from foreign lands who would assimilate with us and become in time a part of the population and of the strength of this country.

I wish to say a word or two about the Chinamen. I have been somewhat familiar with them. I know the Chinaman. I have been in the place that the Senator from Washington told you he went to in San Francisco. I have seen them in every place almost in the West. I have seen them in some of the mining camps in the early days, when they were in greater number than the white population by two or three to one. I know they have most excellent qualities in some directions. They are the best laborers in the world. They are nearly as good as a laborer made out of iron who would not eat nor wear clothes, for they come next to that. Does anybody believe if you could create an automaton that could do the work men are doing it would be a blessing to humanity? Is it a blessing to us to have men come here who are skilled and who can work more hours than any American can or will and for infinitely less wages; who consumes practically nothing and who buys in China and not in the United States practically everything he does consume?

I do not know what the merchants may do in San Francisco. I suppose there are large stores there. I believe there are; but I have never seen a Chinese merchant in my State, and I have seen a great many; and I have never seen a Chinese merchant in the neighboring States, in mining camps, where they depended upon the trade of the American for anything. They sell exclusively to the Chinaman, and they sell exclusively to them the things they buy from China. I have seen a mining camp of several hundred men by the side of a flourishing mining town, where there would not be as much advantage in the trade of four or five hundred Chinese as there would be in the trade of four or five good American miners. They would not buy as much in the community, and when they accumulate, as they do accumulate, they get out of the country and spend their money at home.

The Chinese do not strike. I have never heard of a strike among the Chinamen. I have never heard of any trouble among the Chinamen except in one or two instances, and probably the Chinamen were not so much to blame for them as some others. As a rule, they hire out and do their work and do it well, but they never do become a part of the American people, and they never can become a part of the American people. They do not come here for that purpose. Are Senators willing to take the position that we can afford to let the Chinese come in and take labor from our own people because they work cheaper and are more docile? They are not desirable persons to have in a community.

I have no prejudice against the Chinese, Mr. President. I like to read some of the high-sounding phrases in what might be called the Chinese classics. There is probably no people in the world who will have so much to say upon virtue as the Chinaman; and the less he has apparently the more he has to say about it. He will prate about liberty and equality and truth, and I will venture to say there is not a Senator here from the Pacific coast, who has had any experience with the Chinaman, who would go into a court of justice and hear a Chinaman swearing, who would have the slightest idea that he was telling the truth if it was his interest not to do it. He is a sycophant. He will meet you with a courteous bow. If he can talk English he will give you a compliment with every phrase, and he will declare that he is the most abject creature in the world as compared with yourself.

Mr. President, I wish to take up the bill and go over it a little and see where the harsh places are, because nobody has yet pointed them out, except in a general way. Take the first section, which is one of absolute prohibition. That is according to the treaty. Nobody objects to that. Then the second section is a provision to carry out article 1 of the treaty. I am not going to take the time to read this all through, but if anybody wants to question the statement I make I am prepared to take it up; otherwise, as I did not get at this speech quite as early as I expected and do not intend to keep at it as long as I probably otherwise would, I will forbear reading them. This section is to carry out article 1 and article 3 of the treaty. That is all there is of it, and I should like to have some Senator get up and show any violation of the provisions of that treaty or anything inconsistent with those provisions.

Section 3 defines what a laborer is, just what we defined in the act of 1893 and just what has been defined by the Treasury Department in its regulations years before when China, knowing what our act of 1893 was, in 1894 made this treaty and said we might prohibit these laborers, she knew what we meant by a Chinese laborer. So I need not bother about that. I put that against the statements of Senators who say that these are harsh and unnecessary and unreasonable provisions.

Take section 4. This is one which is very much criticised:

That from and after the passage of this act the privilege of Chinese persons other than laborers to enter or remain in the United States shall be restricted to officials, teachers, students, merchants, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, as hereinafter defined.

Then come the definitions in this bill which I repeat are the definitions which have been in existence for years. The definitions which have been applied to the Chinaman to keep him out, some of them in statutes, more of them in the regulations of the Department which recently and now are being attacked in the Supreme Court of the United States. If anybody can raise a question on the definition in this bill and show that there is anything improper in it I wish he would do so. Nobody has done so up to the present time. It is easy for a Senator to get up and say "these definitions are harsh, these particulars are harsh," and yet not tell us wherein.

We have heard a good deal about the term "teacher." Does anybody suppose that Chinamen are coming here to teach common schools in this country? Does anybody suppose they are coming here to teach the rudimentary lessons we give our children? Everybody knows that is not possible, and everybody knows that you must construe the treaty in accordance with existing conditions; that is, that they could not come here in any other capacity as teachers than in the capacity that the bill provides for—for the teaching of the higher branches of what you may call Chinese learning. That provision was put in to meet the demand made by a few colleges that they might have Chinese teachers, which they have.

It is complained that we say:

That the term "teacher," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who, for not less than two years next preceding his application for entry into the United States, has been continuously engaged in giving instruction in the higher branches of education, and who proves to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer that he is qualified to teach such higher branches and has completed arrangements to teach in a recognized institution of learning in the United States and intends to pursue no other occupation than teaching while in the United States.

The only people who will come in as teachers are those who have already been engaged by some of our colleges to teach certain branches of Chinese learning, and I say now that there is not an instance, in my opinion, where any man who came for that purpose has had any embarrassment at all in getting in and carrying on the business for which he came. I do not believe you can find that a single man who was entitled to come in under the teacher clause has been excluded from the United States.

Then we come to the term "merchant." The term merchant was defined in the act of 1893 practically just as it is defined in this bill, and that act provided just as this does—that he must be actually engaged as a merchant. This is not harsher than the act of 1893, and when the Chinese Government made use of this term they knew exactly what we implied and what proof we exacted of men who came here as merchants.

Take the term "traveler." Everybody knows what that means. I assert here now that there is no provision in this bill which applies to travelers that is not a necessary provision and a proper provision, and if some Senator will tell me what we could leave out of those guards that it is proposed the law shall put on where the regulations have put them on before, I will be very glad to have him do so, and if he does not do so, I think in common decency Senators ought to refrain from making general charges of harshness and wickedness and cruelty of this bill.

I skipped the term "student." It says:

That the term "student," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who intends to pursue some of the higher branches of study, or to be fitted for some particular profession or occupation for which facilities for study are not afforded in the foreign country or the territory of the United States whence he comes, and for whose support while studying sufficient provision has been made, and who intends to depart from the territory of the United States immediately on the completion of his studies.

This definition may be a new one. I do not believe I have found anything about that except in the regulations. There is nothing in the statute, I think, but the regulations clearly have provided for this, and they have been in force for some time. What class of Chinamen come here as students? Not for the common schools. A few, and a few only, come here to go to the colleges. There have been quite a number—I have met some of them myself—who have gone to our American colleges, and I repeat, as I said about the merchants, if any Senator can show that any student who came here as a student properly intending to take a course in any of our colleges or schools has been excluded, I wish he would do it. It can not be done. It is not amongst the possibilities that it can be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not quite understand the last remark of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I said if any Senator can show a case, a single case, where a man who was really a student had been excluded, I wish he would do it. We have always been willing to let them in, and they always get in. There is not any more danger of a student, who comes here as a student, being excluded, than there is of the Chinese minister being excluded. There is not any more danger that a man who comes here as a teacher will be excluded, either, any more than there is with respect to the Chinese minister. All these suggestions of unfairness and injustice and all that arise from an anxiety, it seems to me, to make a bill which will, if made, in my judgment, be very inefficient and absolutely valueless.

Mr. President, you have to consider the class of people you are dealing with. I need not go over that. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] in an address here, remarkably conservative and truthful, explained about the character of the Chinaman. He is not a fool. He is an adroit diplomat. I do not care whether he is a laborer or whether he is a minister who comes here, the Chinaman is the equal, when it comes to a contest of that kind, of any of his class in any nationality. He has the art of diplomacy as it was understood in ancient days by some people, at least, that he is never at all embarrassed by facts. He can make a case to fit the one before him. As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] told you the other day, he can spend more time in trying to fool one of his gods than he would spend in trying to please him by a good deal.

This bill, I repeat, is the product of experience, and it has the approval of the class of men who have dealt with this subject in an official way; that is, the Treasury Department employees. It has, in addition to that, the approval of men who have been dealing with this question actively and earnestly for the last twenty years, who see in this system of exclusion the only safety for American labor, that it shall not be put in competition with Chinese labor.

We pride ourselves upon our labor. We say it is the most intelligent and the most effective in the world, and it is in many ways. But after an American mechanic has invented a piece of mechanism I will guarantee that a Chinese laborer, belonging to the lower classes of Chinamen, will take it and make one as perfect as any American mechanic can make. I will guarantee that the Chinaman can take it and operate it as faithfully and efficiently as any American mechanic can operate it. He will do it upon a food basis on which the American mechanic would die. He can do it and live in places where no American mechanic could live. He will do it without any of the obligations that the American mechanic has with respect to a family. He will do it without any of the obligations that the American mechanic has of supporting the State in which he lives.

After an experience of forty years in the West, I believe the Chinese-exclusion law is an absolute necessity for the maintenance of Western civilization. I believe if we had not twenty years ago by repressive legislation kept them out the western part of this continent to-day would be a Chinese colony. You can put them across that great sea for from five to ten dollars apiece, and they can come into California and Idaho and Colorado and Montana and Washington and live there, I repeat, upon food that no American mechanic alone could live on, much less support his family. It may be that the Senators who live where this Asiatic peril has never threatened can weigh carefully the question of what humanity demands and that they can accord in their minds and in their hearts to the Chinaman the same that they mete out to the American mechanic, but I confess I can not do it. I admit here I do not want to do it, either. I know the American mechanic is better for the American nation than any number of Chinamen, and between them I am going to give my sympathies and my support to the American laborer and the American mechanic.

There have been no regulations made by the Department, I am sure, that are cruel or unusual. I do not know what the last ones are, but, as I said before, nearly all of them have been made by the two officers of the Government whom I have mentioned.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] called our attention to the fact that we were making a distinction between the laboring Chinaman and the merchant, the student, the teacher, and the traveler—that is, we exclude the laborer and admit the other class under certain conditions.

The Attorney-General of the United States, in an opinion which he gave concerning Chinamen, said that the law was intended to keep out Chinamen, no matter where they came from; that whether they were subjects of Great Britain, France, or any other country, it was directed at Chinamen. He said it is a moral and a racial question.

Mr. President, with me it is an economic question as well. I wish to add to what the Attorney-General said. It is an economic, moral, and racial question, and it is to the economic feature I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and those who feel with him. We may be making a distinction and dealing more harshly with the laborer than we are dealing with the merchant or the teacher or the student. It is the laborer of China who threatens our stability as a prosperous people by coming here and taking from the American laborer the opportunity to labor and depriving him of his ability to live. We are not threatened with the teacher. We are not threatened very much with the student. We are not threatened with the merchant. What we are concerned about in regard to the merchant, the student, the teacher, and the traveler is that under pretense of being merchants, travelers, and teachers Chinese shall not come in and in fact be laborers. Beyond that we have but little interest.

We know that if there are 90,000 Chinamen in the United States to-day they displace 90,000 American laborers. That is why we are opposed to this scheme. We are in favor of this bill because we believe that the bill itself is in accordance with the treaty; but if it was not, and it was necessary that it should be otherwise, we would repeat the act of the Forty-fifth Congress, when we abrogated a treaty by a direct vote of the two Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President. But we do not need to do that. We will carry out the treaty of 1894 in this bill.

We are now asked by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to agree to an amendment that he offers to-day. I may be mistaken as to what it means, but I judge from the other amendment which I had the opportunity to examine that the Senator intends to continue until the expiration of the treaty the existing laws under which these regulations were made and under which the features exist which are complained of as being harsh. Does the Senator go beyond that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And until some new treaty shall be negotiated and until laws are passed to carry out its provisions.

Mr. TELLER. Or until some other treaty?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If no other treaty is negotiated it is an indefinite continuance of the laws.

Mr. TELLER. Now, I should like to know—I expect when the Senator makes his speech he will tell us—what benefit comes of that. I dwell a little upon the fact that we are not going to retire from this policy. Nobody will claim that. Nobody will pretend that there is going to be a hiatus. Nothing in the passage of this bill will prevent our making a treaty with China. We have added no new features in this bill. Everything restrictive and repressive in the bill is in the treaty or in the regulations which have been made under the treaty or that were in existence when we made the treaty. We may have provided a little more in detail as to how we shall determine whether a Chinaman is a student, a teacher, or a laborer.

Mr. ELKINS. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. Are the restrictions on the employment of Chinese on American vessels in the treaty?

Mr. TELLER. I am coming to that in a minute. It is a subsequent provision of the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I was going to inquire of the Senator if he had overlooked that.

Mr. TELLER. I have not. I am not going to talk much longer, but—

Mr. ELKINS. When the Senator speaks on that point, let me ask him to tell us whether he is not willing to treat American ships as fairly as we treat foreign ships, and prohibit foreign ships from employing Chinese if we put this restriction on American ships. I should like to have him answer on that point at the right time.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will get to that in a moment. I said in the beginning that I did not care to discuss the question whether we ought to pursue this policy, because so far no Senator has risen here to say that it was not a proper policy, and if it is a proper policy I suppose it is because we have a realizing sense of the character of the Chinamen. So I need not go into that, as it has been gone into before. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], who has had some experience in this matter, has gone into it with a great deal of care, and I think with a great deal of conservatism and fairness. If Senators here would like to look into that question, a very fair and conservative speech, made by a gentleman from Pennsylvania in another place, which Senators have access to, who has been over in that country within the last year, is well worthy of their attention. But we all agree, we are for exclusion, and the only question now is how are you going to do it and do it fairly? I want to do it so that it will be effective, and so that it will not be unnecessarily cruel.

I challenge the statement made here on this floor that we have inflicted cruelty upon those people. Of course, when a Chinaman comes and it is doubtful whether he is entitled to enter the country, he must stay on the ship until that question is determined, which is done very quickly. No unnecessary delay is ever made. I do not believe that anybody can justly complain of the administration of these laws for the last twenty years. The courts have been open to the Chinamen. Take the decisions of the courts and you will find innumerable cases where they have passed upon the rights of Chinamen. The courts are open under this bill to the Chinamen. The bill provides for all those matters.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to say a word about the shipping business. I am one of those who have been exceedingly anxious to see American ships on the oceans of the world, and I have voted on various occasions since I have been in the Senate for measures which I have believed were calculated to bring about that desirable end. I did not vote the other day for the ship-subsidy bill. I did not believe it would bring about what Senators who supported the measure believed it would accomplish. I said then, and I repeat, that if I believed as they do I should have voted for it. I had no constitutional scruples about it and I knew we could spare the money. It did not seem to me that it was a proper scheme, and that was all about it; and I was in hopes we might get another and a better one.

I know very well that for the last forty years there has been no inducement for an American boy to become a sailor. I was not born on the Atlantic coast; I was born 300 miles and more from it, and yet I can go back to my boyhood days and remember many of my associates who became sailors. There were young men brought up in western New York, in good families, of good character, who found it convenient to go down to the New England coast and go on a fishing excursion, perhaps for a year or two, and ultimately upon an American ship. That has not been done, I will venture to say, by any youth in that neighborhood in the last thirty-five or forty years. You will never have an American marine such as you want until you have an American force on American ships.

If I believed what has been said by some, that the intense heat in the Pacific Ocean is such in the hold of a vessel that the firemen and the coal heavers must be of some other nationality, and that Americans should not be used for that work, I should be very loath to vote for any repressive measures with reference to that feature of the bill. But the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] told us that that is not the fact. We have some telegrams here. My colleague [Mr. PATTERSON] has some telegrams that have been sent to him upon that subject and which I will now have read. They were not sent with reference to this bill; they were sent with reference to the statement I had just been questioning. I ask to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 20, 1902.

Senator PATTERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Marine Engineers' Association most emphatically assert that a white fireman can do far better work than a Chinaman, even in the greatest heat. Refer you steamships of the Oceanic Steamship Company and army transports.

HENRY B. LISTER,

Corresponding Secretary Marine Engineers' Association.

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 18, 1902.

Senator PATTERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

White stewards, cooks, bakers, butchers, waiters are sailing to-day on United States transports, Australian and Panama steamers, and no cases of prostration from heat come to our knowledge.
MARINE COOKS AND STEWARDS' ASSOCIATION,
EUG. STEIDLE, Secretary.

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 19, 1902.

Senator PATTERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

White firemen have been employed in the steamers trading to Australia, Manila, Panama, and Tahiti for years; no cases of being overheated have come to my knowledge.

JOHN BELL,

Secretary Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the great bulk of the shipping which goes from our coast to the Asiatic coast goes so far north that I doubt whether there can be any great trouble of that kind. We have not only the testimony of the Senator from California, and the statements now made, but we know also that on the Government transports which go across to Manila, and which take the southern and the hotter route, there has been no complaint—at least, I have never heard any complaint—of the inability of American sailors to serve on those ships in any capacity that they were needed to fill.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] asked me if I am willing to apply the same rule to other ships. I suppose that we can do what some of the Australian colonies have done. I have not looked it up, but I understand they have declared that ships carrying Chinese crews should come in under some disability, that they decline to pay any subsidies whatever where Chinamen serve on ships. They have been paying subsidy for some years to a line that runs from San Francisco to Australia, and that line, I understand, has never carried any Chinese sailors or Chinese stokers or anything of that kind. I suppose the committee have looked into this matter. I am not a member of the committee. On that point I mean to follow the committee. I do not believe that there is any danger that we shall do any harm by doing so. I should like to see all the places possible filled with American sailors.

Now, Mr. President, I only want to say in conclusion that this is not a question which seems to excite the Senate very much. It has been under debate for several days, and a good deal of the time there has been practically no attention paid to the debate. I have heard quite interesting speeches—and I am not referring to my own—made here with not to exceed ten Senators in the Chamber.

This is a question of vital importance to the American people. It is one of deep interest to the people in the West. I hesitate somewhat to say what I am going to say, but I believe that every Senator here who has read this bill with care, who has in his heart an anxious desire to exclude the Chinaman, will vote for it. For myself I shall see with a great deal of regret an amendment adopted, like that offered by the Senator from Connecticut, which will revive this controversy in four years from now. I will not say that the Senator from Connecticut put in that amendment because he does not want to vote for an efficient measure, but I am sure that the bill is more efficient than any other measure we have had proposed. It is not cruel, and it will accomplish what the Senator from Connecticut says he wants to accomplish and what we all want to accomplish.

I wish to say one word about the trade. Mr. President, if I knew that the passage of a proper exclusion bill would destroy every dollar's worth of trade between us and China, I should vote for the exclusion bill. I know that the trade between here and China is not worth the admission of Chinese hordes into this country, and if I had to choose between the two I should take the exclusion.

But, Mr. President, there is no necessity for that. I have heard every time we have had an exclusion bill up the same caution given, "Now, if you are not careful you are going to excite the Chinaman and he will not trade with you." There are no people in the world the Chinaman has such reason to complain of as of the Japanese, and since the cause of complaint arose the trade of China with no part of the world has compared with the increased trade between China and Japan. I venture the assertion here that not one Chinaman out of a million will know what are the provisions of this bill, except to know that it is a prohibition against one class absolutely and a qualified admission of a few others. Anyone who supposes that the Chinamen are going to get excited about this bill does not know the Chinaman. He would not be excited about it under any circumstances. If he could sell to the American people a Chinese article for a pittance more than he could sell it to anybody else he would sell it to us. If he could buy in our market an article for a pittance less than he could buy it of anybody else he would buy it of us. So all that is simply, in my judgment, a bugbear gotten up to frighten people from voting for an efficient and valuable bill.

If this bill did not have the support of the Government officials who have been dealing with this subject, who I believe are reputable gentlemen, I should hardly speak of it with the positiveness I do, even if my judgment was, as it is, that it is the best bill which has ever been offered on this subject, and that it is not an objectionable bill from the standpoint of any man who desires to have an exclusion act passed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12765.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, few measures have received more careful consideration by a committee of the House of Representatives than reciprocity with Cuba.

The Committee on Ways and Means began hearings on the subject on the 15th of January and continued them until a volume of 766 pages was required to contain the statements of persons who voluntarily appeared before the committee.

The question was then considered by the Republican members of the committee for some weeks, and finally a resolution was adopted to submit the question to a Republican conference. Such a conference was called, and after five successive meetings the conference directed the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill providing for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba. Further consultations were held, and finally on March 31 the committee, by a vote of 12 to 5, reported the bill now under consideration to the House.

It has been alleged by Republicans in this debate that this is not a Republican measure; that in some way or manner it lost that quality when three Democrats in the committee voted to report this bill. I say to these Republicans that this measure was strongly recommended in the annual message of Theodore Roosevelt, a Republican President of the United States. It was indorsed by a Republican conference by a vote of 85 to 31. This bill was considered in the Committee on Ways and Means, and nine of the eleven Republican members of that committee voted to report it. It is before the House of Representatives by virtue of that report and it is none the less a Republican measure because three Democrats of the committee joined with the nine Republicans to report it.

This is not a proposition to revise the tariff. The bill is not subject to an amendment changing the rates of duty in any schedule of the Dingley law. The claim that it is the duty of all protectionists to oppose this measure because it opens up a revision of the tariff is unwarranted. The maintenance of a protective tariff is not involved in this proposed legislation, but the future of the policy of reciprocity depends upon the fate of this bill. If we can not have reciprocity with Cuba, we can not have it with any other country. The defeat of this bill would mean that the Republican party had refused to follow the leadership of Blaine and McKinley, and it would mean that reciprocity was no longer a part of the Republican faith. If reciprocity is to be restricted to articles that we do not produce in this country, it will mean an abandonment of that doctrine.

PENDING BILL FOLLOWS REPUBLICAN PRECEDENTS.

The Republican platform of 1896 contained the following statement in regard to the repeal of the reciprocal agreements made under the McKinley law:

We believe the repeal of the reciprocity arrangements negotiated by the last Republican Administration was a national calamity, and we demand their renewal and extension on such terms as will equalize our trade with other nations, remove the restrictions which now obstruct the sale of American products in the ports of other countries, and secure enlarged markets for the products of our farms, forests, and factories.

One of the reciprocity arrangements above referred to was with Cuba, and we are now engaged in an attempt to renew and extend it. After the Republican party returned to power, as a result of the election of 1896, the Dingley bill was reported to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means, and on the 31st of March, 1897, it passed this body and was sent to the Senate. Section 3 of that bill as it passed the House contained a provision authorizing the President, without further action by Congress, to make reciprocal agreements with other nations, by reducing the duties imposed by the bill upon certain specified articles. The Dingley bill, containing this provision, passed the House supported by gentlemen on the Republican side who are now opposing this legislation.

Sugar was one of the articles on which the President was authorized to reduce the duties. The duty on 96° raw sugar was fixed at $1.63 per 100 pounds, instead of $1.685, as in the present law. The President was authorized to reduce the duty 8 per cent, or to $1.499 per 100 pounds. If this bill becomes a law, the duty on the same grade of Cuban sugar will be $1.348 per 100 pounds. If the Senate had not changed the Dingley bill, the President, under it, would have been authorized to make agreements not only with Cuba that would have let in her sugar at $1.499, but also with Germany, France, Austria, and every other sugar-producing country that would have admitted their sugar at $1.499. Section 3 was changed in the Senate, so that sugar was not included among the articles upon which the President was authorized to make concessions.

Section 4 of the present law, however, was incorporated in the bill, which authorized the President to make reciprocal treaties, that must be concurred in by two-thirds of the Senate and approved by Congress, which may reduce any of the duties of the Dingley law not exceeding 20 per cent. If this bill becomes a law, the President will be authorized to reduce the duty on Cuban sugar 20 per cent, or to $1.348, a reduction no greater than he could have made under section 4 of the Dingley law if he had made a treaty within two years from its passage.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1900.

We are met by the statements of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] and other gentlemen that the policy of the Republican party on the question of reciprocity has been changed by the platform adopted at Philadelphia in 1900; that at present we can have reciprocity only on articles that we do not produce in this country. These gentlemen have read from this Republican platform to establish their proposition. I can not consent to this interpretation of the platform of 1900. Let us read it:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce, in return for free foreign markets.

Now, these gentlemen construe the word "what" to mean "articles." They would make it read that we should open our markets on favorable terms for "articles" that we do not ourselves produce. That is not the language of the platform. While subject to that interpretation, it is also subject to another interpretation, and that is that we can open our markets under reciprocity arrangements for such part of our consumption as we do not produce in this country. We do not produce all the sugar we consume. We will consume this year 2,550,000 tons. We will produce from beets and cane in the United States, including Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands, only 875,000 tons. This leaves us to import from other countries 1,625,000 tons.

Under these conditions a fair interpretation of the Philadelphia platform authorizes reciprocal arrangements which include sugar. If we confine reciprocity to such articles as we do not produce at all, we abandon the doctrine. It means that we will no longer have reciprocity as part of the Republican faith. To show that this interpretation is a fair one, I want to call attention to some things that have been done by a Republican President since this platform was adopted on June 20, 1900.

It is fair to assume that President McKinley, who was unanimously renominated at that convention, understood the platform and indorsed its declaration of principles.

Section 3 of the Dingley law, which has been followed in form in the Payne bill now under consideration, authorized the President to make reciprocal agreements. Such agreements were made with four countries—France, Germany, Italy, and Portugal. They are now in force, and include articles which we produce in this country. Two of these four agreements were signed by President McKinley after the adoption of the Republican platform of 1900. On July 13, 1900, he signed the agreement with Germany, and on July 18, the one with Italy. The agreement with France was signed May 30, 1898, and the one with Portugal, June 12, 1900, just one week before the assembling of the Philadelphia convention. Under these agreements, certain articles which we produce in this country are admitted at greatly reduced rates of duty. These four agreements have been in operation ever since. They are in operation now. They include articles that we produce in this country.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman be so kind as to name those articles he relies upon as sustaining his assertion that the platform of 1900 was an abandonment of the old doctrine of reciprocity?

Mr. LONG. I do not claim that it was an abandonment of the old doctrine of reciprocity. I claim the platform of 1900 did not change the policy of the party on reciprocity.

Mr. HEPBURN. You said it was an abandonment of the theory that we were to admit articles that we did not produce.

Mr. LONG. I said that if you confined the doctrine to articles that we do not produce in this country—that if you put that interpretation on the platform—then William McKinley, when he made these agreements, violated the platform upon which he was renominated.

Mr. HEPBURN. Possibly there are to be found in those treaties articles of insignificant character that sustain the gentleman's assertion. But I would like to have him name those articles that he relies upon as proof of his proposition and also to name the value of the importations of such articles.

Mr. LONG. I will do so. The value or importance of the articles is immaterial. It is a question of principle. If we interpret the platform to mean that we can not admit articles under reciprocity that we produce in this country, then we should not violate the platform by the admission of such articles. I will now name some of the articles. Among the articles included in these agreements were brandies, all other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, champagne and other sparkling wines, and still wines.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, the importations under these agreements were: From France, $4,350,334; from Germany, $1,181,552; from Italy, $1,355,558; from Portugal, $297,194. The importations from these four countries under these agreements in that year amounted to $7,185,235. The amounts from all other countries on articles included in these agreements were $8,131,790.

I am informed by the Director of the Census that the champagnes and other sparkling wines manufactured in the United States in the census year amounted in value to $664,972; that the total amount of still wines were of the value of $6,504,701, and that spirits manufactured from grain and other materials amounted to $140,000,000.

It is reasonable to suppose that the value of such articles manufactured in the fiscal year 1901 amounted to as much as those manufactured in the census year.

Not only have we this, but we have further evidence of the practical construction of this platform. It was adopted in June, 1900.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Does the gentleman contend these agreements were in force without ratification by either branch of Congress?

Mr. LONG. Certainly, certainly; they were put in force just like this bill will be put in force. We have under the Dingley law two kinds of reciprocity—one in section 3, covering certain specified articles on which we authorize the President to make a reduction. We say in advance what the reduction shall be. We give him authority to make the agreement. He makes it; issues his proclamation, and that ends it. No further action by Congress is necessary, just as under this bill. Then, under section 4, we have reciprocity treaties. They are negotiated by the President, but must be ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress before they become effective.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Does that power extend indefinitely as to time?

Mr. LONG. Two years is the limit in the Dingley law for making treaties. Now, there were treaties made—

Mr. NEEDHAM. The time is passed, then.

Mr. LONG. There were seven treaties negotiated under section 4 and submitted to the Senate the year previous to the adoption of the Philadelphia platform. In December, 1900—

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. You say that under the law as it now stands the President can enter into a reciprocal treaty with another country?

Mr. LONG. A reciprocal treaty?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman can not get me into a controversy with the Senate on that proposition.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well.

Mr. LONG. The Senate—that is, some Senators—insist that the President can, under the Constitution, make a treaty of commerce, of reciprocity, just the same as he can make a treaty covering any other subject and submit it to the Senate for ratification.

Mr. PRINCE. Then he has that right?

Mr. LONG. They claim so. I am not discussing that proposition or taking any position upon it.

Mr. PRINCE. Has President Roosevelt the same right to make a treaty with Cuba that President McKinley had to make a treaty with Italy and Germany, the countries you have mentioned in your argument?

Mr. LONG. He has not the authority to make a reciprocal agreement with Cuba which would include sugar and tobacco. We are now engaged in the business of giving him that authority.

Mr. PRINCE. Why, I thought you said under the two provisions—

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstands.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well.

Mr. LONG. Those agreements were made under section 3 of the Dingley law. They are similar to the fifteen agreements that were made under section 3 of the McKinley law, under which the President is given authority in advance to reduce the duties. The duty is fixed in the law. Then we say to the President: "You can make a reciprocal agreement, and if you do, the rates shall be so and so," designating them. He can then make the agreement within those limitations, and the Supreme Court, in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649), in construing the McKinley law, decided that such reciprocity agreements are constitutional.

Mr. PRINCE. Very well. Then you claim, as it now stands, if Cuba was free and independent and she wanted to enter into a like arrangement with the United States that Germany entered into that she can not enter into it.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. A similar agreement could be made with Cuba; but the articles named in section 3 of the Dingley law are not produced in Cuba. We are now endeavoring to authorize the President to make a similar agreement on articles that Cuba does produce.

Mr. PRINCE. Yes; very well.

Mr. LONG. We are now endeavoring to give the President such authority. That is the purpose of this bill. If the gentleman will read the Payne bill, now under consideration, and also read section 3 of the Dingley law, he will find—and it is no reflection on the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—that Mr. PAYNE has followed very closely the language in section 3 of the Dingley law, which in turn followed the language of section 3 of the McKinley law.

The treaties negotiated by President McKinley under section 4 of the Dingley law—and I now desire the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]—covered articles that we produce in this country. The treaties with Great Britain provide for the admission of sugar and molasses from the Barbadoes, British Guiana, and Jamaica at a reduction of 12½ per cent from the rates of duty fixed by the Dingley law. The treaty with Argentina provides for a reduction of 20 per cent of the Dingley duties on all sugars—just the reduction proposed by this bill—as well as a reduction of 20 per cent on hides and wool. The treaty with France reduces the duties from 5 to 20 per cent on silk, cotton goods, jewelry, and many other articles, all of which are produced in this country.

These treaties were submitted to the Senate the year before the Philadelphia convention. They had not been ratified, however. In December, 1900, in his annual message to Congress, President McKinley again urged their ratification upon the Senate. He said—and I want the special attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to this—

The failure of action by the Senate at its last session upon the commercial conventions then submitted for its consideration and approval, although caused by the great pressure of other legislative business, has caused much disappointment to the agricultural and industrial interests of the country which hoped to profit by their provisions.

Further on he says:

The policy of reciprocity so manifestly rests upon the principles of international equity and has been so repeatedly approved by the people of the United States that there ought to be no hesitation in either branch of Congress in giving to it full effect.

I commend to the consideration of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and to other Republicans who are opposing this measure because it provides for reciprocity on articles that we produce in this country these words of President McKinley, written in December, 1900, after his triumphant reelection upon the Philadelphia platform.

Mr. SCOTT. That is from his message?

Mr. LONG. That is from his message submitted to Congress. So I say that under the interpretation given to that plank of the platform by the acts and words of President McKinley we can not construe it to mean that reciprocity must be confined to articles that we do not produce in this country. Therefore the Committee on Ways and Means, in reporting this bill authorizing reciprocity with Cuba, are not untrue to the Republican faith when we include among the articles tobacco and sugar, which are produced in this country.

WILL ANY AMERICAN INDUSTRY SUFFER?

Reciprocity with Cuba involves the consideration of the question whether a reduction of 20 per cent on Cuban products will injure the sugar and tobacco interests of the United States.

Congress can not determine whether reciprocity treaties that have been negotiated by the President will injure any American industry until such treaties are submitted to it for ratification and approval. But in authorizing the President to make reciprocity agreements that will become effective without further action by Congress, as is provided by this bill, it is the duty and province of Congress to determine in advance whether such agreements so authorized would harm any American industry.

I do not admit that Congress must leave it to the special interests concerned to determine whether they are harmed or not. If we do so, we will have no more reciprocity agreements; if we do so, we will never change any schedule of the Dingley law in all time to come. For there will always be special interests that will appeal to Congress and say, "Do not do that; do not change that schedule; it will ruin us." Must Congress stop just because these special interests make these claims? Is it the duty of Congress to abandon proposed legislation when such claims are made? I say no. It is the duty of Congress to look into the question and determine, if a reciprocity agreement is made, whether there will still be sufficient protection left to our industries and whether any harm will come from the reduction.

The production of cane sugar in this country is confined to the States of Louisiana and Texas. Beet sugar is produced in 42 factories, located principally in the States of Michigan, New York, Colorado, Utah, Nebraska, Oregon, and California.

During the calendar year 1901 we consumed in this country 2,372,316 tons of sugar. Of this amount 292,150 tons were produced in Louisiana and Texas from cane, 309,070 tons in Hawaii, 66,279 tons in Porto Rico, and 124,859 tons from beet sugar of the United States. The total amount of sugar imported last year, on which duty was paid, was 1,551,881 tons, of which 559,800 tons came from Cuba. Our estimated consumption of sugar for the current year is 2,550,000 tons, of which amount 750,000 tons will come from Cuba; 300,000 tons will be produced in this country from cane; Porto Rico, 100,000 tons; Hawaii, 300,000 tons; beet sugar, 175,000 tons. Nine hundred and twenty-five thousand tons will be imported from other countries than Cuba. Eight hundred and seventy-five thousand tons will be free and 750,000 tons will come from Cuba.

Can we take the sugar and tobacco of Cuba at a reduction of 20 per cent without harm to our industries and labor? This trade arrangement will undoubtedly extend the outlet for our increasing surplus, but will it interrupt our home production?

TOBACCO AND SUGAR ENJOY HIGHEST PROTECTION.

The total duties collected upon all imports into this country for consumption in the fiscal year 1901 amounted to $230,641,499.82, of which amount $62,680,260.03, or 27 per cent, was realized from duties on sugar.

In the fiscal year 1901 cotton and its manufactures paid an average ad valorem duty of 54.87 per cent; wool and its manufactures, 70.21 per cent; silk, 53.07; iron and its manufactures, and steel and its manufactures, 38.15 per cent; leather and its manufactures, 35.13 per cent; tobacco and its manufactures, 110.63 per cent; sugar, 73 per cent.

Sugar constitutes 44 per cent of all of Cuba's exports. It practically all comes to this country. Tobacco and its products constitute 45 per cent of all Cuba's exports, and we take 46 per cent of all the tobacco she exports. Sugar and tobacco are the two principal industries of Cuba. Of course, later on, after they have read the very eloquent speech of my good friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], in which he advises them to go out of the sugar business and go into the orange, lemon, and coffee business, they will quit raising sugar, abandon their plantations with millions of dollars invested in them, and go to raising fruits and come into competition with some of the industries of my friend from California, [Mr. NEEDHAM]. At present—

Mr. KAHN. Is not that what the people there are asking the people of Louisiana to do—to go out of the sugar business?

Mr. LONG. Not at all. The sugar of Cuba comes to this country and will continue to come here, either at a profit or loss.

The average ad valorem duty on all imports into this country was 49.64 per cent in the fiscal year 1901. The duty on sugar is higher now, comparatively, than it was in 1901. It is still $1.685 per 100 pounds, but during 1901 the Cuban planter received an average of $2.30 per hundred pounds for his sugar, which made the duty 73 per cent of his selling price. To-day he receives only $1.60 per hundred for his sugar. The duty is still $1.685 per hundred, which is 105 per cent of what he gets for his sugar. To-day the beet and cane sugar producers of this country are protected from the competition of Cuban sugar by an ad valorem duty of 105 per cent. Can the sugar industry of this country stand a reduction of 20 per cent on this duty without injury?

A reduction of 20 per cent of the present duty would leave the specific duty on sugar $1.348 per 100 pounds. With sugar worth $3.375 in New York, to-day's price, it would be worth $1.937 in Cuba. This would leave the equivalent of the specific duty of 69 per cent ad valorem. It would still leave sugar the most highly protected industry, excepting only tobacco.

During the fiscal year 1901 we imported cigars and other manufactured tobacco products from Cuba of the value of $2,292,151. The duties on these articles amounted to $2,485,150.75. The duties were $192,199.75 greater than the value of the articles imported.

Surely, with the duties on manufactured tobacco amounting to 110 per cent, a reduction of 20 per cent can be made without harm to the tobacco industry.

Sugar is one of the most highly protected articles in the Dingley law, the object being, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says, to use it as trading stock in reciprocity agreements. Now, when we come to make the agreements, we find Republicans from Michigan, California, and other States throwing up their hands and saying: "Oh, we can not stand this."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Were they not put in there for the purpose of stimulating and protecting an American industry?

Mr. LONG. Certainly. It is so stated in the conference report on the Dingley bill.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Were they not put in there for the purpose of stimulating American production?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; the differential duty on refined sugar that you have said you would move to strike out—

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; I have not announced my intention to make that motion.

Mr. LONG. Have you not announced your intention to join the Democrats in that effort?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Not at all.

Mr. LONG. Have you not stated that you would vote with them to overrule the Chair?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No, sir; I am a Republican.

Mr. LONG. You are a Republican clear through?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Clear through.

Mr. LONG. I believe it was the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] who said he would make that motion.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman ought not to get confused about that matter.

Mr. LONG. I am glad to know the gentleman's position. I do not know whether he speaks for all the beet-sugar contingent on this floor.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not recognize that there is any beet-sugar contingent on the floor. I speak for the protectionists on this side.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman speak for all protectionists?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. All those who have registered up to date on the committee's proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman tell me how many are registered?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman ought to know how many are registered, as he has been continuously for five weeks every day in this House endeavoring to find out. [Applause.]

Mr. LONG. But I have not had the opportunities for ascertaining the number on that register like the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Kansas does not see any limitation in the gentleman's ability.

Mr. LONG. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. HAMILTON. What is the matter with Kansas?

Mr. LONG. But the fact is, Michigan's information is much more accurate than mine.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Michigan claims no superior light over that given to the gentleman from Kansas.

DIFFERENTIAL FOR PROTECTION OF BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Mr. LONG. I want to call attention to the differential duty on sugar in the Dingley law. It was the same in the House bill as in the law. The Senate increased it, but the conference committee agreed to the House differential. In the conference report, signed by Mr. Dingley, Mr. PAYNE, Mr. DALZELL, and Mr. GROSVENOR, I find this statement:

In deference to the wishes of those interested in beet-sugar production, that the Senate rate of 1.95 on refined sugar might be retained as an increased encouragement to this industry, the duty on raw sugars is increased seven and one-half hundredths, so as to make the increase on them the same as the increase on refined sugar, and thus leave the differential between raw sugar and refined the same as in the House bill.

That was done as a protection to the beet-sugar industry, and yet there are Republicans in this House—I am glad to know the gentleman from Michigan is not one of them—who have announced their intention, if they can not defeat this bill, to seek to amend it, striking off the differential on sugar from all countries, and thus let in foreign refined sugar in competition with the refined sugar of the United States. If that is done, it will be the first time in our history that there is no differential in our tariff rates between refined and raw sugar.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does the gentleman find that in the Walker bill of 1846?

Mr. LONG. I do; and the gentleman can find it. If he will refer to the Walker tariff of 1846, which was a Democratic tariff, he will find that the duty was 30 per cent ad valorem on all sugars. If he will refer to the prices of sugar at that time he will find that the price of refined sugar was much higher than the price of raw sugar. This difference in prices made a differential in the Walker tariff that was much greater than the present differential.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does the gentleman say that is expressly stated in the law?

Mr. LONG. Expressly stated in the law in this way: The law said 30 per cent ad valorem on all sugars. This made a differential in the Walker tariff, because there was a difference in the values of the sugars on which this duty was levied. There has been a differential in all other tariffs, whether Federal, Whig, Democratic, or Republican, from 1789 down to the present time. The differential of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound in the Dingley law is lower than the differential in any other tariff law.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman has stated that in the Walker tariff of 1846 there was a differential. Now, I find that in that tariff there was a uniform duty of 30 per cent ad valorem upon sugar of all kinds. I would therefore like the gentleman to state where he finds his foundation for the statement that that tariff contained a discrimination or differential?

Mr. LONG. Does not my friend understand that there was a difference at that time in the prices of raw sugar and refined sugar?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. In the market?

Mr. LONG. Yes; in the market.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. But here is a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem levied upon all kinds of sugar—

Mr. LONG. Certainly. Take the duty in that tariff of 30 per cent ad valorem on crushed sugar worth \$11.37 a hundred. That duty would amount to \$3.41. Then take Havana brown sugar worth \$7.80 a hundred. The duty on that sugar at 30 per cent ad valorem would be \$2.34. The difference, \$1.07 per 100 pounds, was the differential established by the Walker tariff. The present differential under the Dingley law is  $12\frac{1}{2}$  cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. That is a question of the market price, not a question as to the law. The law fixed a uniform duty of 30 per cent ad valorem upon all sugar. That was not a differential.

Francis K. Carey, president of the National Sugar Manufacturing Company, of Sugar City, Colo., gives the freight rate (Hearings, p. 436) from Sugar City to Kansas City and common points as 25 cents per 100. The following is his testimony as to the cost of producing beet sugar in Colorado (Hearings, p. 438):

Mr. METCALF. Let me put this question right here; I want to put it in connection with this line of remarks. You asked Mr. Carey the price he received for his sugar in his first campaign, Mr. NEWLANDS, and my recollection is that he said somewhere about 5 cents a pound. What did it cost you, Mr. Carey?

Mr. CAREY. It cost about 9. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, how about your second campaign? What did it cost you in that campaign?

Mr. CAREY. I am not able to answer that question at present, but I think I can tell you what you want to know. My opinion is that during the first campaign our sugar cost us all the way from 7 to 9 cents, according to what you allow for depreciation, what you call betterments, and what you call operating expenses, and whether you do or do not allow interest on the cost of the investment. I think that for the first two campaigns we will manufacture between nine and ten million pounds of sugar, at an average cost of about  $5\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound.

Mr. LONG. I am surprised to have such a proposition submitted to me by a colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means. If it had come from some gentleman who had not given the close attention to economic questions that the gentleman from Texas has, I might not have been so much surprised. But when the gentleman is unable to find any differential in the Walker tariff of 1846, which levied a 30 per cent duty on sugar of one value and 30 per cent on sugar of a higher value, of course I must decline to explain the matter further.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I appreciate the gentleman's kindness; but I still adhere to the assertion I made that there was in that law a uniform duty levied. It may be that in consequence of the prices of different kinds of sugar one kind had an advantage over another kind; but there was no discrimination or differential in the law; there was a uniform tax levied on all kinds of sugar. That was the law.

Mr. LONG. The Wilson-Gorman tariff law levied a duty of 40 per cent ad valorem on all sugar, and in addition a specific duty of one-eighth of 1 cent on refined sugar. Does the gentleman claim that the only differential in the Wilson-Gorman law was that one-eighth of 1 cent specific duty?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No; I have not said and do not claim that there was not a difference in tax in the practical operation of the law upon the different kinds of sugar; but I want to reply to the gentleman by asking him this question: Is he willing now to adopt the system adopted in the Walker tariff and levy a uniform duty on all sugar?

Mr. LONG. Certainly not. We have discarded ad valorem duties whenever possible. We impose specific duties, because we know just what they are.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. If, under a uniform duty, you had practically the benefit of a differential, as you claim, why should you object to putting a uniform tax on all these products?

Mr. LONG. Because of the fact that ad valorem duties give opportunity for fraud by means of undervaluation. The Dingley law was framed upon the theory that duties should be specific as far as possible. Am I not correct [turning to Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. At some future time, in the quietude of the consultation room of the Committee on Ways and Means, I will endeavor to explain to the gentleman from Texas the differential in the Walker tariff of 1846, as well as in all other tariffs since the beginning of the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I suppose it is a problem of multiplication and division.

Mr. LONG. It is.

I now refer to the duty on sugar from Cuba. The present price of 96° raw sugar in New York is $3.375 per 100 pounds. The present equivalent ad valorem duty on that sugar is 105 per cent. If we reduce the duty on Cuban sugar 20 per cent it will leave the equivalent of 69 per cent ad valorem. Yet the gentleman from Michigan said his industry would decline and dwindle away under a protection of only 69 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I said it would imperil the industry.

Mr. LONG. Imperil it! The growth of his industry lies in the difference between a duty of 69 per cent ad valorem, what it would have under this bill, and 105 per cent, that which it has now!

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I say the security of our industry lies in the difference between the maximum production of sugar in Cuba of 800,000 tons to-day and a possible production of 2,500,000 tons in the future.

Mr. LONG. We will take care of the 2,500,000 tons of Cuban sugar when it comes. We will meet the problem of increased production in three or four years, when the application is made by Cuba for annexation to the United States. A great increase of production will not happen under this reduction of 20 per cent of the duty.

If this legislation fail and no concession be made to Cuba, if the policy of President McKinley and President Roosevelt be defeated, it may result in free sugar from Cuba. After the establishment of the Republic of Cuba a treaty may be negotiated with that country by the President. That treaty can provide for the annexation of the island of Cuba, as the recent treaty did for the annexation of the Danish West Indies, and that treaty can be submitted to the Senate and ratified. The moment that the ratifications are exchanged, under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Porto Rican case, we would have free trade with Cuba on all products.

So this House is not supreme, and it does not control or dominate this situation. It would be the part of wisdom for us to make a reasonable concession that will not injure any industry in the remotest degree. This question will not be settled if Congress at this session declines to take action. Conditions in Cuba are such that this question will not be settled until action is taken that will afford the desired relief, and will enable Cuba to recuperate. The failure of concessions at this time may mean the growth of annexation sentiment in Cuba, and in the near future the beet-sugar industry of this country may have to face the possible annexation of Cuba, which would ultimately mean free sugar from Cuba as it has from Porto Rico.

Annexation will probably come in the not far-distant future, but when it does come I want it to come by the free act of the Cuban people, and when they come permanently under our flag, I do not want them to feel it is forcible annexation, which President McKinley characterized as "criminal aggression."

CUBA CAN NOT COMPETE WITH BEET SUGAR IN CHICAGO.

Will a specific duty of $1.348 per hundred be a sufficient protection to the beet-sugar industry of the United States? It costs 9 cents per hundred for freight and other charges to ship raw sugar from Cuba to New York City. It costs $2 per hundred to produce sugar in Cuba and put it on board ship. Hence it would cost the Cuban planter $3.488 per hundred under the proposed law to place his raw sugar, duty paid, in New York City, without any profit. It is conceded that it costs $0.625 per hundred to refine sugar (Hearings, p. 575), without profit to the refiner. Hence it would actually cost $4.063 per hundred to turn out refined sugar in New York from Cuban sugar paying $1.348 duty per hundred pounds.

On this basis neither the planter nor the refiner would make or lose. Chicago and Missouri River points, especially Kansas City, are the markets for the beet sugar produced in this country. The freight on refined sugar from New York to Chicago is 29 cents per hundred pounds, and 36½ cents to Kansas City. Adding these freight charges to the actual cost of refined Cuban sugar in New York, it would cost $4.353 per hundred to lay such sugar down in Chicago without profit to anyone. It would cost $4.428 per hundred to deliver it at Missouri River points. Can the beet-sugar producers meet these prices on a cost basis? Chicago is the market for the beet sugar of Michigan and the Northwest. Can the producers of sugar in Michigan place their refined sugar on the Chicago market for $4.353 per hundred?

N. H. Stewart president of the Kalamazoo Beet Sugar Company, when before the Committee on Ways and Means, made the following statements (Hearings, page 212):

Coming to the cost of manufacturing sugar in Michigan, it costs $5.20 for 1 ton of beets; $1.06, cost of supplies per ton of beets; $1.51, cost of labor for entire year per ton of beets; $1.09, cost of repairs and depreciation per ton of beets; 91 cents, cost of interest, insurance, and taxes per ton of beets; 6.3 cents, cost of selling sugar per ton of beets. This make a total cost per ton of beets of $9.883; total cost per 100 pounds of refined sugar, $4.682.

The above estimate includes 5 per cent interest on the total capital invested, and 7 per cent annual depreciation on the value of the plant. Leaving out these two items, the cost of manufacturing each 100 pounds of refined sugar is reduced $0.671, or to $4.011.

Mr. Stewart states that the freight rate to Chicago is 13 cents per hundred. It costs his company $4.011 plus $0.13, or $4.141 per hundred pounds, to put its sugar into Chicago without profit, while it costs $4.353 to put the Cuban sugar there in competition with it, a difference of $0.212 in favor of the beet-sugar producer under the proposed reduction.

W. L. Churchill, president of the Bay City Beet Sugar Company, stated (Hearings, pp. 468-469):

Mr. CHURCHILL. I mean 1899-1900. It cost 4½ cents to make sugar. That amount represents labor and the cost of the beets, all combined.

The succeeding year (now let us not get mixed again), which would be 1900-1901, we had learned a little more about our business. The first year we were in the kindergarten class. We got out of that into the A B C class. Then we produced sugar for $3.96 per hundred pounds. I want you to bear in mind all the time that the farmer comes in and is a great factor in this matter. We paid the farmer $2.51 for the sugar contained in the beet as he delivered it to our bins.

The CHAIRMAN. I am a little anxious to know how you came out the next year.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I am frank to say, gentlemen, that I have not a full, detailed statement that I can make to you in regard to this year; but I can assure you that we will make sugar this year at a cost of not to exceed $3.60 or $3.75 per hundred pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. You think it will be between those figures?

Mr. CHURCHILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you there a statement in detail about the cost of sugar?

Mr. CHURCHILL. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you leave that with the stenographer and have it printed in the hearings?

Mr. CHURCHILL. I will do so. It is as follows:

BAY CITY SUGAR COMPANY.

Statement of cost of making sugar, 1900-1901 campaign.

Beets .....	$273,517.95
Coal .....	23,707.20
Labor, including clerks' salaries .....	54,962.63
Supplies, such as sulphur, oil, filter cloths, piping, paper fitting, etc. ....	6,767.15
Lime rock .....	3,951.00
Coke .....	1,925.00
Barrels and bags .....	10,480.00
Insurance and taxes .....	10,024.00
Expenses .....	1,900.00
Repairs .....	23,000.00
Salaries .....	15,000.00
Total .....	425,234.93

To make 10,730,543 pounds sugar, or 0.0396 cent per pound.

Amount paid for sugar in beets .....	$0.0251
Amount of factory expenses .....	.0145

Total cost production 1 pound sugar ..... .0396

While still in the A B C class, Mr. Churchill's factory produced sugar for $3.96 a hundred, although $23,000 for repairs is included in this cost. If the Bay City freight rate to Chicago be the same as that from Kalamazoo—13 cents—his company can lay its sugar down in Chicago for an actual cost of $4.09, as against an actual cost of $4.353 for the Cuban sugar, a difference of $0.263 in favor of beet sugar.

BEET SUGAR HAS ADVANTAGE ON KANSAS CITY MARKET.

Kansas City and Missouri River points are the market for the beet sugar of Nebraska and Colorado. The actual cost of placing Cuban sugar refined without profit on this market under the proposed reduction would be $4.428. Can the sugar producers of Colorado and Nebraska meet this price on a cost basis?

When we get through our third campaign, I think the total sugar manufactured for the three years will not have cost us over 4 cents. In making this last calculation I am estimating on the future; but I am anxious to make it plain that I believe the cost of sugar in Colorado under normal conditions, which we will sooner or later have surrounding our factory, ought not to be over 3 cents a pound, and I am not afraid to say that I will some day manufacture it for less than that sum. If I had not thought so, I would not have invested my own money or the money of my friends in the industry in Colorado. In other words, I think Colorado is the natural place to produce sugar for consumption in America. It is not a case of "protecting bananas grown under glass." If I am mistaken in my belief that sugar can be grown in Colorado for 3 cents or less, I am free to admit that I have no standing before this committee, and have no right to ask for the protection of my industry.

It will be noticed that Mr. Carey's company is now producing sugar cheap enough to reduce the average cost on the 9,000,000 to 10,000,000 pounds put out during their first two campaigns from 5½ to at least 4 cents. He evidently bases his statement that his factory can turn out sugar for 3 cents upon a substantial basis. But taking $4 a hundred as the average cost for three years, and adding the 25 cents freight rate to Kansas City, his sugar would cost him only $4.25 in that market against $4.428 for Cuban sugar, a difference of $0.178 in favor of beet sugar.

OXNARD ON COST OF MAKING BEET SUGAR.

Henry T. Oxnard, president of the American Beet Sugar Association, said (Hearings, pp. 169-170):

The cost of producing beet sugar in the existing factories in the United States to-day varies tremendously, and the only way to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion is to take the averages. If this is done, we find that Michigan has produced sugar at about 4 cents. Taking the average of all the factories with which I have been connected in the past ten years, we will find that the cost is just about 4 cents, varying all the way from 3½ to nearly 6 cents in the different factories during different years.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the turned-out product.

Mr. OXNARD. That is the finished granulated sugar, ready for the consumer.

Our company has two factories in California, two in Nebraska, and one in Colorado, and this ought to give a very fair average. We see individual factories varying from one year to another in a remarkable way, this variation being due to the quality of the material, the quantity worked, and the fluctuating cost of labor and materials in different years. You must not forget that this is a new industry and has not come down to its bearings, but when sugar has been produced for about 3 cents it is safe to say that some day the average of the United States will not only be brought to this, but probably under it. But, as I said before, the average cost of producing granulated beet sugar in the United States to-day, from all the facts and figures which I have been able to obtain, will bring that cost somewhere between 4 and 4½ cents without any interest on the capital invested, but including from 5 to 7 per cent for depreciation of plants, which is a very moderate reduction, and probably below the actual figures which ought to be applied.

COST OF MAKING BEET SUGAR IN UTAH.

Thomas R. Cutler, president of the Utah Sugar Company, shows (Hearings, pp. 237-238) that the beet-sugar industry of Utah has nothing to fear from Cuban competition, even at a much greater reduction than that which is proposed. He gives the average cost to his company of refined beet sugar for five years as follows: 1897, $4.51 per hundred; 1898, $4.46; 1899, $3.55; 1900, $3.55; 1901, $3.42. The average cost of producing sugar for these five years was $3.86 per hundred, and the average selling price has been $5.76 net, or a clear profit of $1.90 per hundred. Mr. Cutler explains that Utah has an abundance of child and woman labor, and that it is so far inland that the freight rates from either coast are very high, and adds:

I desire to call to your attention these local conditions because of the reputation my company has had for paying dividends, and to tell you why we have been able to do so.

Upon his return to Utah, after testifying before the committee, the following interview with him was published in the Lehi (Utah) Banner of February 6, 1902:

BISHOP CUTLER HOME—THINKS THAT CONGRESS WILL CONCEDE SOMETHING TO CUBANS—HAD PLEASANT TRIP—HE THOUGHT THE FIGURE WOULD BE ANYWHERE FROM 25 TO 33½ PER CENT OF THE EXISTING TARIFF.

Manager T. R. Cutler returned from his eastern trip Sunday evening. He went to Salt Lake on Monday and attended a directors' meeting of the Utah Sugar Company. Speaking of the Cuban question, he said: "It is my opinion Congress will concede something to the Cubans, though not so much as they have asked for." He thought the amount would be anywhere from 25 to 33½ per cent of the existing tariff. He rather thought the higher figure would prevail. This would mean a reduction of 56 cents per hundred pounds taken off the present tariff in favor of Cuban sugar.

Mr. Cutler said he was aware that his remarks, stating that the beet-sugar interests could stand a reduction of 25 per cent, had been criticised, but he could not in honesty take any other course.

We have been in business about eleven years, all of which, with the exception of a few opening ones when the industry was being started, have been successful. If we were to say now to our stockholders and investors that we could not stand a 25 per cent reduction without bringing ruin upon our business, they might well be alarmed, especially in view of the fact that no one in the East supposes that such a reduction would affect materially the price of sugar. Cubans themselves insist that it would not, because they need all the benefit of the reduction at home. Besides the great overshadowing question of the future, which the beet-sugar interests will have to face, is the possible annexation of Cuba, which would mean free sugar. It will be much better, to my mind, to agree on a compromise of 25 per cent if that question can be staved off indefinitely.

OXNARD FACTORIES FEAR NO COMPETITION.

In further proof of the proposition that the beet-sugar producers of the United States can successfully compete with cane sugar from Cuba, I refer to the following statement of the American Beet Sugar Company, taken from the New York Times of April 2, 1902:

Beet-sugar profits.

The annual meeting of the American Beet Sugar Company was held in Jersey City yesterday, when what is known as a "campaign statement"—practically an annual statement—was presented, and directors were elected as follows: W. Bayard Cutting, R. Fulton Cutting, Henry T. Oxnard, James G. Oxnard, Dumont Clarke, George Foster Peabody, Edwin M. Bulkley, Kalman Haas, James G. Hamilton, Robert Oxnard, and James A. Murray. The only change was in the election of Mr. Murray, who succeeds Dennistoun Wood, deceased.

The campaign statement is as follows:

Sugar produced, 77,932,502 pounds.
Total credit.....	$3,521,047
Cost of operating.....	2,667,029
Gross profits.....	854,018
Cost of maintenance.....	362,710
Profits of campaign.....	491,307
Estimated results for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902:
Campaign profits, Norfolk.....	15,226
Campaign profits, Rocky Ford.....	276,403
Campaign profits, Oxnard.....	258,191
Total.....	549,820
Campaign loss, Grand Island.....	$15,430
Campaign loss, Chino.....	43,063
	58,513
Campaign profits.....	491,307
General expenses and interest.....	225,000
Available for dividends.....	266,307

No statement explaining the items in the report was forthcoming, but an officer of the company said the idea was to show the stockholders that there were profits enough to insure dividends. The company has $5,000,000 6 per cent noncumulative preferred stock and $15,000,000 common stock. All the latter is outstanding and $4,000,000 of the preferred. Six per cent on this preferred would be $240,000, while, as the report shows, there is available for dividends $266,307.

I call attention to the statement of Mr. Cutting, chairman of the board of directors of the American Beet Sugar Company, whose president—Henry T. Oxnard—has devoted his attention very assiduously and closely in Washington this winter in an endeavor to frighten the American Congress and prevent action on this matter on the ground that the beet-sugar industry of the country would be ruined by this reduction. Then he goes to New York on the 1st day of April and has a meeting of his stockholders. They figure up what they have made this year in their different factories. Then comes this statement, and I call the especial attention of my genial friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] to it:

W. Bayard Cutting, chairman of the board, in his statement to the stockholders, says:

In presenting to you the campaign statement of your company the chairman wishes to call attention to the fact that large amounts were expended during the year for alterations and improvements to the company's plants. Without going into tedious details, it may be said that with the prospect of a good tonnage, and the record for 1900 of a fair price for sugar, the officers determined to put their factories into a position to avail of the latest manufacturing facilities, so that they might be able to compete in sugar-making capacity with any plants in the world. This, we think, has been done.

The increasing tonnage operated and the consequent necessity for being amply prepared for the opening of the campaign compels a very large increase in the amount of supplies permanently on hand at the company's five factories.

The factory at Oxnard is now, as your chairman believes, in a condition of thorough efficiency. For the first time in the history of this factory the management is confronted with the probability of a full supply of beets of a high quality.

The agricultural conditions at Chino are similar, and the officers report that they are assured of an acreage as large as they dare engage. At Rocky Ford, Colo., the conditions are singularly encouraging. The factory seems sure of a supply of not less than 125,000 tons of beets. The conditions in Nebraska are somewhat more favorable than last year at this date. It is difficult to predicate results in that district so early in the year, where the "weather" is still to come.

Everything looks more favorable for a satisfactory campaign for 1902 than at any time in the writer's experience, if the price of sugar be excepted. The abnormally low price of sugar in the world's markets is causing us, in common with every sugar producer here and elsewhere, a reduction of business profits below what is reasonable. In 1900 we enjoyed 5.32 cents per pound for our output (which was smaller than the output in 1901). For 1901 we will average, after all our sugar is sold, not over 4.40 cents. The difference between these figures would have amounted, on our output of 1901, to about $565,000, or about 3½ per cent on the common stock.

Your chairman does not venture to prophesy as to sugar prices. He believes them to be in certain parts of the country below the cost of production, as indicated by the market price of raw sugar, the expenses of refining, and the transportation charges. He believes that your plants can manufacture the refined product more cheaply than any other beet-sugar factories in the United States, and therefore below the cost of granulated sugar made from imported raws.

Does the gentleman from Michigan understand that statement?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; and does he say where that raw sugar is to come from, what raw sugar it is?

Mr. LONG. He makes no exception in this statement. He does not except or refer at all to this proposed legislation or say that if this bill does not pass they are all right, and if it does they are ruined.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should regard it as very important if he said he could do that as against the raw sugar of Germany.

Mr. LONG. He makes no exception. He says further:

The abolition of the sugar bounties recently recommended and adopted by the Brussels conference will certainly tend toward higher prices for sugars throughout the world, as operating to reduce the proportion of beet sugar in the European countries that now produce two-thirds of the world's consumption. The experts of Europe are quoted as stating that the reduction in the beet-planted acreage in Europe will amount to 12½ per cent of this year's crop, an amount estimated at about 800,000 tons.

At this the expert must leave the subject. You are probably as well able as he to indulge in prophecy as to this branch of the business, and on the agricultural and operating side the officers of your company are able to make a pleasant showing for the next campaign. The sugar market is not within their control; when they have prepared themselves to meet the market with a cost of product lower than that of any competitor they have done all in their power or all that you or any reasonable person could expect.

Mr. SCOTT. What does he mean when he says the price of sugar is not within their control?

Mr. LONG. He means that the price of sugar is fixed at Hamburg, and that conditions over there control the world price, as I shall show later along in my remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the antecedent of the word "their?"

Mr. LONG. That refers to the men managing the factories. He is speaking for the managers, the men who are managing the Oxnard factories; and remember that Mr. Oxnard, in his statement as to the cost of production, put it at the same figure as your Michigan manufacturers did.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What was that rate?

Mr. LONG. About 4 cents a pound. Bishop Cutler and those who are making sugar in Utah and Colorado put it less. They said they could make it for 3 cents a pound in those factories, but Mr. Oxnard and the Michigan manufacturers put it at 4 cents a pound.

I will not weary the committee further with a statement as to the cost of producing sugar in this country, but this is the proposition: Will the admission of 750,000 tons of sugar from Cuba at a reduction of 20 per cent affect the price of refined sugar in this country? If it does—if it lowers the price—we will fail in the object of our legislation, because no benefit would go to the Cubans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended, so that he may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that his colleague's time be extended so as to permit him to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THIS REDUCTION WILL NOT LOWER SUGAR PRICES.

Mr. LONG. Will the price of refined sugar in this country be affected by this reduction? If it be not, then there will be no harm done to the beet-sugar industry. They will get the same price in the markets which they now supply as they did before the legislation was enacted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. As I understand from that portion of the gentleman's argument which he has just completed, he takes the position that 69 per cent will be ample protection to the beet-sugar industries; that is, they can live with the protection that will be left after the passage of this bill.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, now, why should not this bill be made to apply to sugar imported from all countries? If the beet-sugar industry will not be hurt by this kind of a reduction, then why should not we reduce all along the line?

Mr. LONG. I am just coming to that proposition. You admit 750,000 tons of sugar at a reduction, and keep the present duty on 925,000 tons imported from other countries, and you do not affect the price of sugar in this market.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; but as I understood the gentleman, he made the statement that under 69 per cent protection, without regard to what the rate might be on sugar from other countries—that under a 69 per cent protection the beet-sugar industry could live and thrive.

Mr. LONG. Sixty-nine per cent on sugar from Cuba.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But the gentleman did not limit it in his remarks to Cuba.

Mr. LONG. I certainly did, and called attention to it. I have not been arguing for a reduction of 20 per cent in the duties on sugar from other countries than Cuba.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; but your argument was directed to the proposition that by taking off this much tariff on sugar, the beet-sugar industry could still thrive.

Mr. LONG. Not on all sugar, but on sugar from Cuba.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That may have been the gentleman's purpose, but I did not so understand his remarks.

Mr. GROW. That is what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG] said in his speech.

Mr. LONG. The hearings contain many statements made by beet-sugar witnesses that the price of refined sugar in this country would not be affected by a reduction on Cuban sugar of 20, 25, or even 50 per cent; and some of them went so far as to say that free sugar from Cuba would not affect the price of sugar in this country if the present duty was retained on sugar from other countries.

The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, who is opposed to this bill, made the following statement in his speech in this House in opposition to this bill on April 8, 1902:

Now, admit Cuban sugar free, or admit it with a reduced duty, and what is the result? Will the price of our domestic sugar be reduced? Not at all, for the price of our domestic sugar to-day is the world's price of sugar plus our duty, plus the freight to this country, and that will be the case until the United States produces its entire consumption. As long as 100,000 tons are imported from abroad and this duty lasts the domestic price of sugar in this country will be the world's price plus the duty, which means that in America to-day the American people pay double the world's price for their sugar.

Now, suppose we let in Cuban sugar free or with a reduced duty. It means that only one-third of the two-thirds of foreign production comes in with a reduced duty. We still import 750,000 or 800,000 tons, and the price of that will be the world's price plus the duty, so that the domestic price to consumers will be maintained at the same rate.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman then admits that the consumer would not get any advantage by this reduction?

Mr. LONG. Reduction on sugar from Cuba?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. From Cuba—that the consumers in America would not be the beneficiaries; that the sugar eaters would pay the same price after this bill becomes a law as they pay now?

Mr. LONG. I have been endeavoring for over an hour to make that point clear. I am sorry that I have failed as completely to enlighten the gentleman on this point as I did in making clear the differential in the Walker tariff.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It may be clear if you will answer the question.

Mr. LONG. For the benefit of the gentleman I will say that this reduction in duties on Cuban products is for the benefit of the Cubans and not for the benefit of the consumers of this country. If the price of sugar went down 20 per cent as a result of the reduction, the Cubans would not be benefited. They would get that much less for their product.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then, let me ask you the further question: Then this is a gratuity of $8,000,000 to the Cuban people; a gift to Cuba of $8,000,000 by the people of the United States?

Mr. LONG. It is a concession to Cuba on our tariff rates.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is a gratuity, a gift, a concession; it does not make any difference what the language is in which you express the idea. If you are going to make this concession, why do you not take it out of all the industries of all the people of America instead of taking it from a few agricultural industries?

Mr. LONG. It is not a gratuity; it is not a gift. There were some in the Republican conference who wanted to make it a gift. They wanted to give a bounty to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to the government of Cuba for distribution among the people of that island. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] demolished this scheme so completely that up to date it has not been referred to in this debate. We are to make concessions on Cuban products, and under the reciprocity agreement they are to make concessions on our products.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. A reciprocity that does not reciprocate.

Mr. LONG. We will obtain concessions on the meat products of Texas. Your district and your State, on their meat and other products which they will sell to Cuba, will probably get more benefit than any other part of the country, unless it be Minnesota, on her flour products. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Texas. In reply to that, allow me to say that all the flour they use there now goes from the United States under the present tariff and present tax.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman should understand that the Cubans did not make their present tariff. It was made by our War Department. We have reduced the duty on flour almost 400 per cent, on bacon 200 per cent, lard almost the same, while the reduction on corn and machinery has been even greater. In other words, while doing nothing for Cuban products we have manipulated the Cuban tariff for our own advantage, and out of the five articles mentioned, four are agricultural products. We made these reductions to benefit the products of Texas and other States in the Union. This is a military tariff, made by us. We have no assurance that the people of Cuba after they get control of their government will still leave these great concessions on our products if we refuse to make the concession of 20 per cent on Cuban products coming into this country.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then, it is my understanding that the gentleman is legislating here for Cuba.

Mr. LONG. I am glad that the gentleman from Texas has at last understood me. We are legislating for Cuba—

Mr. COOPER of Texas (continuing). And not your people.

Mr. LONG. We are also legislating for our people. A reciprocity agreement is advantageous to both countries, or it is not a good agreement; and I shall show later on that it has advantages at our end of the line.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Did you not say just a moment ago that this was a concession of $8,000,000 to Cuba from the people of this country? The consumers of sugar in this country will not get the benefit of it. If it is reciprocity, then it is a reciprocity that benefits the Cubans, and will not benefit your own people.

Mr. LONG. Can not the gentleman understand?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think he can.

Mr. LONG (to Mr. DALZELL). You do not believe he can? Probably he can not, but I will try it on him again. [Laughter.] Can not the gentleman understand that while Cuba will get the benefit of the concessions that we make on her sugar and other products coming into this country, that we will get benefits when the meat products of Texas and the flour products of Minnesota and Kansas enter Cuba at a reduction of duties?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. They go there now; and it is very evident that the teacher is not able to instruct his pupil.

Mr. LONG. They go there now under the military tariff we have made.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Of course it is your tariff.

Mr. LONG. It is a military tariff made by the War Department, and may be changed at any time after the Cubans obtain control of their government.

A number of witnesses stated before the Committee on Ways and Means that a reduction of from 25 to 50 per cent on Cuban sugar would not affect the price of refined sugar in the United States. I refer to a few of such statements. Robert Oxnard, representing the beet-sugar interests (Hearings, p. 313), said:

The only active competition that the refining interest has is the beet-sugar production. Therefore I claim that the price of refined sugar in the United States will not be lowered by the admission of Cuban sugar free or by a reduction of duty, except in so far as it suits the refining industry at certain periods of the year and in certain localities to put down the price in order to make it unprofitable for its competitors.

Henry T. Oxnard, president of the American Beet Sugar Association, on page 184, in answer to the questions of Mr. McCLELLAN, said:

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the duty on raw sugar is reduced between Cuba and the United States, what will be the effect upon the price of refined sugar?

Mr. OXNARD. Will you state what reduction?

Mr. McCLELLAN. We will state first, free raw sugar.

Mr. OXNARD. It will be imperceptible.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then how will you be injured by the price of refined sugar remaining the same?

Mr. OXNARD. I will tell you how. Because capital would go into Cuba, and the Cuban industry would be artificially stimulated up to a point of producing what the United States would use, and filling the markets and driving us out as long as she was not annexed and could work under either semi-cool or slave-labor conditions, and we had to pay a high price for labor. It is a fact that the whole cane-sugar industry of the world never thrives very well except with semislave labor. The history of it has been so, unless they worked under some sort of semislave cool-labor conditions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then a reduction of less than that would affect the price still less?

Mr. OXNARD. I said I did not think it would affect it hardly any to the consumer; I do not believe it would.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Say there was a reduction of 50 per cent, would that practically have any effect?

Mr. OXNARD. Not to the consumer, in my opinion.

Mr. METCALF. Who will get the benefit, in your opinion?

Mr. OXNARD. In my opinion the sugar trust and the merchants who control these factories in Cuba who lend their money to do the work.

Mr. METCALF. We allowed Hawaiian sugar to come in free in 1876, did we not?

Mr. OXNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. METCALF. Did that result in a reduction of the price to the consumer?

Mr. OXNARD. No.

Mr. METCALF. Who received the benefit?

Mr. OXNARD. The refiners and the Hawaiian planters, but exactly in what proportion they got it I do not know; but the consumer got absolutely no benefit of the reduction of raw sugar from the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. Leavitt, on page 253, in answer to the question as to what would be the effect of a 25 per cent reduction on Cuban sugar, said:

Mr. LEAVITT. It would be to give no benefit to the community at large in the price of sugar; but it would enable the sugar trust, by maintaining the present price of refined sugar in markets in which our beet sugar does not come in competition with them, to so increase their profits that they could use that increased profit to further extend their operations of last summer, of selling sugar at  $\frac{3}{4}$  cents per pound on the Missouri River, or half a cent below the cost of raw sugar in New York.

James D. Hill, on page 275 of the hearings, said that a reduction of 50 per cent on Cuban sugar would affect the price of raw sugar in this country, but when asked whether it would affect the price of refined sugar, said:

Mr. HILL. Not according to my theory, as that price is fixed by the cost in Hamburg, plus insurance, tariff, and the like, delivered in New York.

DR. H. W. WILEY'S TESTIMONY.

Dr. H. W. Wiley, in his testimony before the committee, on page 504 of the hearings, said in regard to the production of beet sugar:

The important question now arises, "May not the price of production be diminished to meet the fall in prices which Cuban free sugar would produce?" I myself have long been a believer in lower and yet remunerative prices for sugar, and have stated that the amount of sugar produced in Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba in 1899-1900 could be introduced duty free without danger to our own industry. These prices would be the result of better agriculture, improvement in the sugar content of the raw materials, improved technique in the factories, resulting in economy of fuel, saving of labor, and more profitable utilization of by-products. As a prophet, I have looked forward to the time when the cost of making refined sugar would not be quite 3 cents a pound in this country, and when, with fair profits to farmers, makers, and factory, it would go on the consumer's table at less than 4 cents a pound.

The Doctor refers here to his statement before the Industrial Commission on May 14, 1900. On page 654 of volume 10 of the report of the Industrial Commission, he said:

Mr. CONGER. How about the Philippine Islands as a place for the sugar industry?

Dr. WILEY. I know less about them than Cuba.

Mr. CONGER. Is it your idea that those engaged in this beet-sugar industry need have no fear of the effect of their being included?

Dr. WILEY. Absolutely none. When the Spanish war commenced and my friends commenced to write to me these despairing letters that we were going to be ruined by free sugar, I never for a moment had any fear. If we to-day were to admit absolutely free from duty every pound of sugar made in Porto Rico and Cuba and the Philippines, it would not affect the progress of our sugar-beet industry in this country. We still have to have this deficit in sugar supplied from some place, and the best place to get it is here, right in our own country.

Mr. CONGER. If this cane sugar from Cuba would be admitted free, would not the price of sugar be less here, necessitating the factories running at a less profit and possibly at a loss?

Dr. WILEY. Suppose we admit free of duty this sugar. We would still have to import sugar, and the duties on sugar would probably remain the same as they are. That would tend to fix the price of sugar. By the way, it is not an unmixed evil to have a low price on an agricultural crop. It has a good many good points. In the first place, it increases consumption and the demand for the article, and that tends to restore the price. In the second place, it teaches economy in the manufacture which otherwise would never have been taught. Louisiana people, if you had told them two or three years ago that they would have to sell their sugar at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound, they would have held up their hands in horror; but they are doing it and making money.

To show that Dr. Wiley still holds the same views, I refer to his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means, at page 513 of the hearings:

Mr. NEWLANDS. Another question. Doctor: Which would you prefer with reference to the general interests of America—a reduction of 50 per cent in this duty on Cuban sugar or the annexation of the island as a part of the United States? Which, in your judgment, would be the most injurious?

Dr. WILEY. You know I am an expansionist. Personally, I believe in getting everything we can get hold of.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And if you are an expansionist, you believe in getting a good and a rich country, do you not?

Dr. WILEY. I certainly do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And you regard Cuba as one of the best and richest countries in the world, do you not?

Dr. WILEY. Yes; and I am against the views of my sugar friends, in that I am in favor of annexing Cuba for the good of all concerned.

SPECIAL AGENT SAYLOR'S TESTIMONY.

Special Agent C. F. Saylor, the beet-sugar expert of the Department of Agriculture, believes that beet sugar can be produced at a profit, even though refined sugar is much lower than it is to-day. He says (Hearings, p. 532):

The beet-sugar industry can only be successfully introduced in this country, and factories will only go in and make the attempt, when the opportunity is offered them to work out and solve the problems they have to encounter. To-day they are producing sugar at something like 4 cents and over per pound.

I offer it to you as my best knowledge and belief that the time is coming when they can cut down that cost of production one-half, as Germany cut down her cost of production one-half. (See p. 575, Hearings.)

If the reduction on Cuban sugar will not lower the price of refined sugar in this country, and even if it does, if Dr. Wiley and Mr. Saylor are correct, then the beet industry of this country need have no fear from a concession on Cuban sugar. Mr. Saylor, in his testimony before the Industrial Commission on May 16, 1900, page 587, volume 10, made this statement:

We are able to produce in this country at the present time beet sugar under the best conditions for about 3 cents per pound, the cost ranging from 3 to possibly  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound. In Porto Rico it was my privilege to make an investigation of the cost of producing sugar in that country, and after making a careful analysis of the cost, through a great many factories, I found that they could produce sugar at actual cost to themselves and place it on our markets for about  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent per ton—short ton. This does not figure in our tariff, which is  $\$1.68$  per hundredweight.

Mr. CONGER. Two cents a pound?

Mr. SAYLOR. Yes; 2 cents a pound.

Mr. CONGER. Refined or raw?

Mr. SAYLOR. Raw.

Mr. CONGER. What is it worth to refine sugar?

Mr. SAYLOR. It is worth about 65 per cent on the west coast and about 55 on the Atlantic.

Mr. CONGER. That gives the cost of raising a pound of sugar in Porto Rico and placing it on the market here refined as something over  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents, according to your opinion?

Mr. SAYLOR. Yes; that is, actual cost to themselves, figuring no profit to anybody anywhere. While I made investigations along this line in Cuba, I had not the facilities or time for giving it as close an analytical study as I had in Porto Rico, but the conclusions I came to were that it would cost very nearly the same in Cuba. I have recently been making investigations along the same lines in the islands of Hawaii. There are factories there that can produce sugar a great deal cheaper than that, but the cost of producing sugar in the islands of Hawaii and shipping it to this country is about  $$40$  a ton on the average.

On page 588, same report, Mr. Saylor expressed an opinion in regard to the effect upon the beet-sugar industry in this country, saying:

Mr. CONGER. Your idea is, then, that those who engage in the production of beet sugar in this country have little reason to fear this competition from the islands?

Mr. SAYLOR. Yes. Is that the idea you get from my talk?

Mr. CONGER. We get the idea from your talk that, in spite of our having acquired this territory, it is still a safe business to engage in here.

Mr. SAYLOR. Yes; perfectly safe.

Mr. CONGER. In your opinion, then, the future of beet sugar in the United States is not menaced by this acquisition of territory?

Mr. SAYLOR. I do not think so. I do not think island competition is going to be extensively started at once, and I think every year we are in it that our people will reduce the cost of production, and that the islands will be increasing in the cost of production, referring to the Hawaiian Islands and Porto Rico and Cuba.

If no material reduction in the price of sugar is caused by the concessions on Cuban sugars, what injury can come to the beet-sugar interests of the United States?

WILL SUGAR TRUST RECEIVE BENEFIT OF CONCESSION?

Another important question to determine is whether concessions made on Cuban sugar will help the Cuban planters or whether it will inure to the benefit of the sugar trust. The claim was made in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means that any concession made on sugar would not benefit the Cuban sugar planter, but would inure to the benefit of the sugar trust. The benefit will surely accrue to the person owning the sugar at the time the concession is made.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER] seems to admit that this concession will go to Cuba and to the Cuban planters. There is where we want it to go. But there have been some gentlemen on this floor who claimed that the concession would not go where we want it to go, but would go to the sugar trust, and so would not benefit the Cuban sugar planter.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then may I ask the gentleman a question there? Is it not the consumer that pays the tax? If your measure goes through, will it not be the sugar trust who will purchase it and acquire it and pay the tax and collect this tax out of the American consumer?

Mr. LONG. The gentleman himself is one of the consumers. Mr. COOPER of Texas. But the sugar that comes here is acquired by the sugar refiners, is it not? They are the consumers, are they not? The consumer pays the tax. They are the consumers who purchase that sugar, which they refine, and pay the tax.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman himself is one of the 80,000,000 consumers of sugar in this country.

There is only one price for sugar in New York, whether it comes from Cuba, Hawaii, Porto Rico, or Hamburg. The Hawaiian planter gets this price upon the payment of freight and insurance from Honolulu. The Louisiana planter gets this price upon the payment of insurance and freight charges from New Orleans. The Porto Rican planter gets this price upon the payment of insurance and freight charges from San Juan. The owner of sugar in Hamburg gets this price by paying freight and insurance from Hamburg, and in addition the duty and the countervailing duty. The Cuban planter gets this price by paying the freight and insurance charges from Havana, and in addition the duty. This duty on 96° raw sugar is $1.685 on each hundredweight. The Cuban planter must pay this much in addition to the Porto Rican planter to land his sugar in New York, which is practically the only market for sugar from Porto Rico and Cuba.

When Congress two years ago granted a concession of 85 per cent on Porto Rican sugar the price of sugar in San Juan instantly rose that much, and the Porto Rican sugar owner got the benefit of that reduction. If the reduction of 20 per cent on Cuban sugars is made the Cuban planter will have to pay $1.348 per hundredweight, in addition to freight and insurance, in order to deliver his sugar in New York, instead of $1.685 per hundredweight, as he does now.

Now, while there have been a good many assertions on this floor that the sugar trust will get the benefit of the concession, there has been only one gentleman who has attempted to prove this assertion by figures. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] is the only one who has attempted to show by a mathematical demonstration that this concession goes to the sugar trust. He said he had demonstrated it "with the exactness of a theorem in Euclid."

CUBAN AND PORTO RICAN PRICES COMPARED.

Prior to May 1, 1900, Porto Rico paid full duty on her sugar; from May 1, 1900, to July 25, 1901, 15 per cent of Dingley rates; since July 25, 1901, her sugar has been duty free. Who got the benefit of these reductions, the Porto Ricans or the sugar trust?

In the Republican conference the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] used the following table, taken from official statistics, showing the average prices received by Cubans and Porto Ricans for their respective sugars per 100 pounds at port of shipment for the eleven fiscal years ending June 30, 1901:

Year.	Porto Rico.	Cuba.	Difference.
			Porto Rico.	Cuba.
1891.....	$3.00	$3.10	.....	$0.10
1892.....	2.90	3.10	.....	.20
1893.....	3.20	3.30	.....	.10
1894.....	3.20	3.00	$0.20	.....
1895.....	1.80	2.20	.....	.40
1896.....	2.10	2.20	.....	.10
1897.....	1.80	2.10	.....	.30
1898.....	1.90	2.20	.....	.30
1899.....	2.30	2.50	.....	.20
1900.....	3.40	2.60	.80	.....
1901.....	3.40	2.40	1.00	.....

The above table shows that the average price of sugar in Porto Rico in 1901 was $3.40 and the average price in Cuba was $2.40. The difference in duty between Porto Rico and Cuba at that time was $1.43, and as the difference in price was only $1 instead of $1.43, the gentleman from Minnesota argued that the sugar trust had absorbed the other 43 cents per 100 pounds.

I answered that argument in the Republican conference by showing its fallacy, and the erroneous conclusion reached by it is due to the mistaken premises upon which it is based. It is based upon the hypothesis that Cuban and Porto Rican sugars are of the same grade and that they test 96° on the average. Porto Rican sugars, taken crop for crop, are inferior in quality to Cuban sugars, pound for pound. This is shown by the table just quoted. Up to and including the year 1899 Cuba and Porto Rico paid the same duties and sold their crops on our markets under the same conditions. Yet it will be seen that in eight out of the nine years Cuban sugars sold for from 10 to 40 cents per hundred more than the Porto Rican.

WHY PORTO RICO RECEIVES LESS FOR SUGAR.

The Annual Report of Commerce and Navigation for 1901, issued by the Treasury Department, gives a detailed statement of all sugars imported into the United States from Porto Rico during the 15 per cent of regular tariff period, from May 1, 1900, to July 25, 1901. This statement shows that an unusually large proportion of Porto Rican sugars are of low grades. The dividing line between centrifugal and muscovado sugars is 91°. These tables show that 43.2 per cent of all Porto Rican sugars tested 91° or less, and that only 56.8 per cent of them tested above 91°. I regret that no similar statement in reference to Cuban sugars alone is obtainable. But this same report gives a similar statement for all duty-paying cane sugars imported into the United States for the fiscal year 1901. Cuban sugars are included in these tables and constitute 39 per cent of them. Of these sugars, only 22 per cent tested 91° or less, while 78 per cent of them tested above that grade.

Assuming that the Cuban sugars were up to the average of those in the table in which they were included, we have the following results: Taking 91° as the dividing point between centrifugal and muscovado sugars, 43.2 per cent of the Porto Rican and 22 per cent of the Cuban fall below the line; 56.8 per cent of the Porto Rican and 78 per cent of the Cuban go above it. The appraiser of the New York custom-house kept a record of the tests of all sugars arriving at that port during January, 1902. The average for Porto Rico was 91°; for Cuba, 93.67°. So, apply what test you may, the fact remains that Porto Rican sugar is, and for years has been, marketed in a less advanced state of manufacture than Cuban sugar. Consequently, it sells for a less price per pound.

Refiners pay for the saccharine in the different grades of sugar, taking into consideration the cost of refining each grade. Centrifugal sugars are bought and sold on the basis of their testing 96°, muscovado and molasses sugars on the basis of 89°, or that they are 96 per cent and 89 per cent pure saccharine. Muscovado sugars sell regularly for 50 cents per hundred less than centrifugals, while molasses sugars sell for 25 cents a hundred less than muscovadoes. Hence the prices of sugar from different countries, or even from the same country, will vary greatly per pound, according to the stage of manufacture or the kind of sugars marketed. The June, 1901, Summary of the Commerce of Cuba, issued by the Division of Insular Affairs, War Department, on the sugar industry of the island, states:

The lack of uniformity in prices for the same month, as shown in the following tables, is due to the difference in the quality of the sugars. Some ingenios produce a better—that is, a more refined—sugar than other ingenios, and this difference in grade determines the price.

This in large part explains the gross irregularities in the prices obtained for sugar exported to countries other than the United States. For example, the sugar which Havana exported to Spain was the American refined article reshopped. Other shipments, some of them bringing less than 2 cents per pound, were mixtures of sugar and syrup, the third-class article, and were bought by ships' masters for consumption on board their vessels.

PORTO RICO RECEIVED FULL BENEFIT OF TARIFF REDUCTIONS.

The daily sales of sugar in New York are a matter of record, just as are sales of hogs or cattle in Kansas City. I had recourse to these records of sugar sales. I sought and obtained from nine different commission merchants of New York and Boston account sales of 11 different lots of Porto Rican sugars and 12 of Cuban sugars. No one firm knew what had been requested of any other firm. So far as possible sales of Cuban and Porto Rican sugars to the same refinery, but by different commission merchants, were selected, sales made on the same day or on the same market prices. In no instance was the same firm asked for account sales of both Cuban and Porto Rican sugars. These sales cover the three duty periods in Porto Rico. They show that in each instance both the Porto Rican and the Cuban obtained the regular market price for the quality of sugar he had on the market. They show that the Porto Rican received every penny of the benefit derived from the reductions in his tariff. They also explain how and why the Cuban received 20 cents a hundred more than the Porto Rican did for his sugar in 1899, and how these conditions were reversed in 1901 until the Porto Rican received $1 a hundred more than the Cuban.

SPECIFIC ACCOUNT SALES ANALYZED.

I first call attention to two sales made in March, 1899, one Cuban and one Porto Rican, while both islands were paying full duty.

No. 1. Sale of Porto Rican sugar, March 31, 1899.—This was 500 bags of centrifugal sugar shipped by Messrs. Ramon Cortada & Co. from St. Johns, Porto Rico, by the Arcadia, to A. S. Lascelles & Co., New York commission merchants, for sale: Date of sale, March 31, 1899; class of sugar, centrifugals; market price that day, $4.375 to $4.4375 for 96°; basis of this sale, duty paid, $4.4375 for 96°; net weight of sugar, 136,812 pounds; actual test of sugar, 95.70°, or .30° below standard; sold to American Sugar Refining Company.

No. 2. Sale of Cuban sugar, March 25, 1899.—This was 1,230 sacks of centrifugal sugar shipped by Messrs. J. Regney & Co. from Manzanillo, Cuba, by the Seneca to Hugh Kelly, a New York commission merchant, for sale. This was a "cost-and-freight" sale, one in which the buyer pays the duty, insurance, and custom-house charges, the seller paying the freight and all other charges. Date of sale, March 25, 1899; class of sugar, centrifugals; market price that day, $4.375 for 96° duty paid; basis of this sale, cost and freight, $2.6875 for 96°; rate of duty on 96°, $1.685; cost-and-freight price, plus duty, $4.3725; margin for insurance and custom-house charges, $0.0025; net weight of sugar, 336,592 pounds; actual test of sugar, 96.80°—0.80° above standard; sold to B. In these sales the Cuban sugar netted its owner $2.492 per 100 pounds; the Porto Rican, its owner $2.43 only. Yet, the Porto Rican sold March 31 on a market ($4.4375) which was $0.0625 higher than the market ($4.375) on which the Cuban sold March 25. Each received the full market price for his sugar, yet the Cuban sold for $0.1245 more, on the same basis, than the Porto Rican because of its better quality.

EFFECT OF PORTO RICAN TARIFF REDUCTION SHOWN.

The next sales to the details of which I call attention were made in October, 1900, when Porto Rico paid only 15 per cent of the duty which Cuba paid.

No. 3. Sale of Porto Rican sugar, October 15, 1900.—This was a duty-paid sale of 266 bags of centrifugal and 277 bags of molasses sugars shipped by Geo. I. Finlay from San Juan, Porto Rico, by the Ponce to L. W. & P. Armstrong, New York commission merchants. The sale was to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. These sales netted the Cuban an average of $2.96 for his sugars and the Porto Rican $3.58 for his. The difference is only 62 cents a hundred. The Porto Rican's duty averaged $0.2256 per hundred; the Cuban's, $1.6757. The difference is $1.4501. Yet it is very easy to see from the figures of these sales why the Porto Rican did not get $1.45 a hundred more for his sugar than the Cuban, although he got every penny of the benefit in the reduction in the tariff. These were the regular prices. The records show that on the three business days of October 13, 15, and 16, 1900, there arrived on the New York market 133,737 bags, 29,622 baskets, and 114 barrels of sugars from Honolulu, Brazil, Java, Cuba, Porto Rico, Peru, Demerara, Germany, St. Croix, and Surinam which sold at these same prices at which these Cuban and Porto Rican sugars were sold: $4.75 for 96° centrifugals and $4 for 89° molasses.

But the Porto Rican centrifugals tested only 95.15°, while the Cuban tested 96.35°. So the selling price of neither was $4.75, because of the variances from the standard. The Porto Rican price dropped to $4.44375, while the Cuban went up to $5.021875; yet each got the same amount of money for 100 pounds of the saccharine contained in his sugars. The difference in prices was due to the difference in the quality of the sugars and not to the sugar trust. It is also worthy of note that 94 per cent of the Cuban sugars were centrifugals above the standard, while only 48.8 per cent of the Porto Rican were centrifugals and those below the standard.

ACCOUNT SALES WHEN PORTO RICAN SUGAR FREE.

The next sales to which special attention is called were made after Porto Rican sugar became free.

No. 5. Sale of Porto Rican sugar, January 30, 1902.—This was a duty-free sale of 1,499 bags of centrifugal sugar, shipped by Messrs. Morales & Co., from Ponce, Porto Rico, by the H. Luckenback, to Messrs. Czarnikow, McDougall & Co., New York commission merchants. The sale was made to Arbuckle Brothers. Date of sale, January 30, 1902; class of sugar, centrifugals; market price for that day, $3.6875 for 96°; basis of this sale, $3.6875 for 96°; net weight of sugar, 361,140 pounds; test of this sugar, 95.9726°; selling price, on basis of $3.6875 for 96°, $3.68476; sold to Arbuckle Brothers.

TOTAL REDUCTION OF TARIFF GOES TO PORTO RICO.

These two lots of sugar are just about the same grade. They are both centrifugal, sold on the same day, at the same price, to the same refinery, but by different commission merchants. The tests are very nearly the same, the Porto Rican being 95.9726°; the Cuban, 95.70°. If the Porto Rican gets the benefit of the tariff reductions he ought to get the full amount of this tariff more for his sugar than the Cuban received. Let us see how they came out.

The Cuban had to pay $1.67674 per 100 duty. If the sugars were just the same and the other charges the same, the Porto Rican ought to have received $1.67674 per 100 pounds more for his sugar than the Cuban. But the sugars were not the same. This time the Porto Rican had the better sugar.

On the basis of $3.6875 for 96° sugar, the Porto Rican got $3.68476 for his sugar; the Cuban, only $3.6575 for his, because it was not as good an article. Consequently—if the other charges were the same—the Porto Rican should have received the difference between $3.68476 and $3.6575, or $0.02726, in addition to the duty more than the Cuban. Adding $1.67674 and $0.02726 gives $1.704 per hundred as the amount the Porto Rican should have received more than the Cuban, if the other charges were the same. But these charges were not the same. It will be seen that the Porto Rican had to pay 14 cents per hundred freight, while the Cuban paid only 8.95 cents. The difference is $0.0505 in favor of the Cuban. Deducting this $0.0505 from $1.704 gives $1.6545 as the correct amount per hundred which the Porto Rican should have received more than the Cuban. As a matter of fact, he received $1.6579 a hundred more than the Cuban, or nine-twentieths of 1 cent a hundred more than the difference in duty and freight. This Porto Rican sugar netted its owner $3.4889 per hundred; the Cuban, $1.831.

It will thus be seen by the above statements of prices received in New York, on actual transactions, that the Porto Rican sugar producer has received the full benefit of the reductions that have been made on sugar from that island. It makes no difference whom we thought would be benefited by these reductions, the fact remains that the benefit accrued to the Porto Rican sugar producer.

These six transactions illustrate the results of our war with Spain upon Cuba and Porto Rico. Cuba had been fighting valiantly for years to throw off the economic and political tyranny of Spain. Her cities had been sacked, her plantations laid waste, her mills and factories burned, her men killed, and her women and children subjected to the horrors of the reconcentrado camps. Porto Rico lay by her side. Her people were tranquil and as prosperous as they had been in recent years. They had never raised a hand or fired a gun to throw off the yoke of Spain.

We went to war with Spain to relieve Cuba. The world applauded the act. After we had sunk the Spanish navies in Manila Bay and off the southern coast of Cuba and decimated her armies on land, Spain sued for peace. The Teller resolution stayed our hand and we did not take Cuba. But we took Porto Rico. What are the results? Have we relieved Cuba? What have we done for Porto Rico? What have we done for Cuba? Sugar is the main dependence of each island. Before we intervened Cuba's sugar, because of its superior quality, netted its owner from 10 cents to 40 cents more per hundred than the Porto Rican. But we have given Porto Rico free trade. To-day the Porto Rican, who never fired a gun or shed a drop of blood to bring about the results, is getting from $1.50 to $1.65 more for his principal product than he did before the war, while Cuba, despite her heroism, her suffering and bloodshed, is getting less than before. Such is the irony of fate and the results of legislation by Congress.

ANOTHER FALLACIOUS COMPARISON.

It is not surprising that when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] came to argue this question in the House he abandoned his comparisons of Porto Rican and Cuban prices. However, he made the following comparisons of Porto Rican, Hawaiian, and Cuban sugar prices with prices of Hamburg sugar for the fiscal year 1901.

Morris's comparisons.

PORTO RICO.		HAMBURG.
Price at San Juan.....	$3.40	Price at Hamburg.....	$2.20

He then said:

We see that the American buyer, the sugar trust, was paying to the Porto Rican 38 cents per 100 pounds less than he ought to have been paid on all the sugars brought from that island to New York during the fiscal year 1901, to the Hawaiian 38 cents less per 100 pounds on all the sugar brought from those islands to San Francisco during the fiscal year 1901, and to the Cuban 20 cents less per 100 pounds on all the sugar brought from that island to New York during the fiscal year 1901.

I am glad now to observe the presence of my genial friend from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS]. I had noticed his absence. I want to ask him, with his permission, some questions. Why do you put the "greater value to the refiner" at 5 cents on the Porto Rican side of your table and at 25 cents on the Hamburg side in your Hawaiian table?

Mr. MORRIS. The Porto Rican sugar has a degree of 92½—2 degrees less than the Hamburg sugar, the Hamburg sugar being 94½. To compensate for that I have put it on that side of the equation. The Hawaiian sugar has a degree of 96 or more, being greater than the Hamburg or beet sugar, and the difference in value to the refiner therefore goes on the other side of the equation.

Mr. LONG. Why, in comparing the Cuban sugar with Hamburg, do you put "greater value to the refiner" on the Hamburg side?

Mr. MORRIS. Because the degree of the sugar coming from Cuba is 95, half a degree greater than sugar coming from Germany. Now, mark what the expert says in regard to that. Degree for degree, the cane sugar is worth 10 cents a hundred more than the beet sugar; that is, cane sugar at 94½ is worth 10 cents more than beet sugar of the same degree. Now, add for the other half degree and you get 15 cents. The Hawaiian sugar, instead of being 95 as is the Cuban sugar, is a little more than 96. The Treasury statistics give it as high as 96.7—nearly 97.

Mr. LONG. Very well; I am glad to get the gentleman's explanation. I can not agree with him exactly as to the countervailing duty and other items. He puts the countervailing duty at 27; it is really 26.

Mr. MORRIS. I took that from Mr. Leavitt's statement before the committee, which was uncontroverted.

Mr. LONG. Neither can I agree with the gentleman as to some of the details of his computation. I think they are wrong; but in the main, I take the gentleman's explanation of his table. Now, let us analyze it. It would have been better for the gentleman if he had stood on the proposition he made in the Republican conference and had used it in his speech to the House—the comparisons between Porto Rico and Cuba—rather than to have made comparisons with Hamburg prices.

Mr. MORRIS. In my speech in the conference I made comparisons on the Hamburg prices. There is where the gentleman misunderstood what I said. I told him so at the next conference. The testimony shows that the world's price of sugar is fixed in Hamburg; and my comparisons in the conference were made on the Hamburg prices.

Mr. LONG. You compared Cuba with Porto Rico.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes; and I made a mistake. I can make the comparison now. The difference between Porto Rico and Cuba is not as great as between Hamburg and Porto Rico, because in Porto Rico and Cuba the sugars are all cane sugars. The comparison by the price at Hamburg, which fixes the price, gives the differences.

FATAL ERROR IN COMPARISONS.

Mr. LONG. Let me analyze the gentleman's statement. His comparisons of prices cover the importation of sugar in the fiscal year 1901 from Hamburg, Porto Rico, Cuba, and Hawaii. The following table will show the imports, in tons, of raw beet sugars from all countries and of raw cane sugars from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba during the fiscal year 1901, by months, with New York average prices by months.

The prices are obtained by taking the average of the weekly prices found on page 3104 of the June, 1901, Summary of Commerce and Finance, issued by the Treasury Department. The imports of beet sugars and of the cane sugars from Porto Rico and Cuba are taken from the several Monthly Summaries of Commerce and Finance issued by the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1901. No Government publication gives the monthly imports from Hawaii, as sugar from those islands was duty free. The Hawaiian figures are taken from Willett & Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal of the issues of January 3, 1901, and January 2, 1902.

Month.	New York price.	Hamburg.	Hawaii.	Porto Rico.	Cuba.

Grand total		405,661	171,857	63,733	490,356

These figures will show the error into which the gentleman has fallen and that he overlooked some considerations in these comparisons that he ought to have noticed before he presented them to the House. Beet sugar from Europe comes in largely in the autumn, and sugar from Porto Rico and Cuba in the spring. I call the attention of the gentleman to the average monthly prices during the last fiscal year. In July, 1900, the average New York price was $4.80 a hundred.

Mr. MORRIS. Where are the gentleman's prices taken from?
Mr. LONG. The prices are taken from the Summary of Commerce and Finance for June, 1901, and the gentleman can find them on page 3104.

Mr. MORRIS. What prices are they?

Mr. LONG. New York prices.

Mr. MORRIS. My prices were all at the port of shipment, every one of them.

Mr. LONG. Your prices were at the port of shipment?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Certainly; but these are the New York prices that the Hamburg, Porto Rican, Cuban, and Hawaiian sugars sold for in New York. The prices "at the port of shipment" which you take from Government statistics are obtained by subtracting from these New York prices the freight, insurance, and duty, if any.

What do these figures show? The following is a comparison between the first six months of the fiscal year and the last six months of it:

Average price.	Hamburg.	Hawaii.	Porto Rico.	Cuba.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
$4.70, first six months	228,993	85,075	9,740	53,573
$4.21, last six months	176,668	86,782	53,993	436,783

The first six months the average price was $4.70, and 228,993 tons of beet sugar came in from Hamburg at that high price. There were 85,075 tons from Hawaii, only 9,740 tons from Porto Rico, and only 53,573 from Cuba.

The average price for the last six months was $4.21 as against $4.70 in the first six months. How about the importations? There were 176,668 tons from Hamburg as against 228,993 in the first six months; 86,782 from Hawaii as against 85,075; 53,993 from Porto Rico as against 9,740; 436,783 from Cuba as against 53,573.

Let me compare certain months. Take September, 1900, when the price was $4.99, and March, 1901, when the price was $4.03. The following are the figures:

Date.	Price.	Hamburg.	Hawaii.	Porto Rico.	Cuba.
		Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
September, 1900	$4.99	25,047	4,184	376	278
March, 1901	4.03	20,898	13,331	10,033	94,513

There were 25,047 tons from Hamburg, 376 tons from Porto Rico, and 278 tons from Cuba in September. In March, when the price was so low, $4.03, there were 20,898 tons from Hamburg, 10,033 tons from Porto Rico, and 94,513 tons from Cuba.

The Hamburg sugars came in when the average price was $4.70 and the Cuban and Porto Rican sugars came in when the average price was $4.21. The difference between $4.70 and $4.21 is 49 cents, and the gentleman only claims that there was a difference of 20 cents between Hamburg and Cuba and 38 cents between Hamburg and Porto Rico. These figures settle the questions between Cuba and Hamburg and Hamburg and Porto Rico.

MISTAKE IN HAWAIIAN FREIGHT RATES.

How about Hawaii and Hamburg? There is a difference of 38 cents. Now, we find that in the first six months of that year there were 85,075 tons came in from Hawaii, and in the second six months 86,782 tons. They had the advantage of both the high and low price, and we can not account for the difference in the Hamburg and Hawaiian prices on that proposition. But what did the gentleman do in his figures? He compared Hawaiian sugar at San Francisco with Hamburg sugar at New York, and he made a difference of 38 cents. What is the difference between the prices of sugar in San Francisco and in New York? It is the difference in the freight rates from Honolulu to the two points. He gives the freight at 15 cents. That is the freight from Honolulu to San Francisco. But is it fair to compare sugar in San Francisco with other sugar in New York? The difference in freight between Honolulu and New York and Honolulu and San Francisco is 37½ cents per hundred.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption there?
Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Might you not just as well make a comparison between the price of sugar from Hamburg sent to San Francisco as to make it from Honolulu sent to New York? The natural American port for the sugar from Hamburg is New York. The natural American port for sugar from Honolulu is San Francisco. If you are going to make a comparison of the price of sugar from Honolulu with the price of sugar from Hamburg, you had just as well add the freight from Hamburg across the continent to San Francisco for Hamburg sugar to meet Honolulu sugar as to add the freight across the continent the other way for Honolulu sugar to meet the Hamburg sugar. Does not the gentleman understand that?

Mr. LONG. Is it fair to compare Hamburg sugar in New York with Hawaiian sugar in San Francisco?

Mr. MORRIS. Surely.

Mr. LONG. Why not compare Hawaiian sugar in New York with beet sugar in the same place?

Mr. MORRIS. And why not compare beet or Hamburg sugar in San Francisco with cane sugar from Hawaii in the same place?

Mr. LONG. You can compare it there if you wish, but you did not do so in your comparisons. You compared Hamburg sugar in New York with Hawaiian sugar in San Francisco.

Mr. MORRIS. If I took the Hamburg sugar to San Francisco, then the item of freight instead of being 8 cents from Hamburg to New York, as I made it, would be 8 cents plus the 37½ cents across the continent.

Mr. LONG. If the gentleman wants to take Hamburg sugar out of New York, where he has it in his comparisons, and put it in San Francisco, all well and good. We will meet that when the gentleman does it. He must add to the freight to New York the difference in freight between Hamburg and San Francisco and Hamburg and New York.

Mr. MORRIS. That would make the difference of the freight across the continent.

Mr. LONG. New York is the market in the United States, and there is where the sugar should be brought in order to make a comparison. Hawaiian sugar is sold at the New York market price on the day previous to its arrival either in New York or San Francisco. On arrival at San Francisco—and I want the attention of gentlemen to this—the difference between the freight from Hawaii to New York and the freight from Hawaii to San Francisco is deducted from the New York market price. San Francisco is a limited market.

The freight from Hawaii to San Francisco is 15 cents a hundred pounds, as you give it, and the freight from Hawaii to New York is 52½ cents a hundred pounds. The difference is 37½ cents a hundred pounds. The New York price of 96° sugar yesterday was $3.375. Should one cargo of Hawaiian sugar arrive in New York to-day and another in San Francisco, the one arriving at New York would sell for $3.375 and the one arriving at San Francisco would sell for $3 per hundred.

If you want to compare Hamburg sugar with Hawaiian sugar, you should add 37½ cents to the freight on the Hawaiian sugar in order to land it in New York City, where you have your Hamburg sugar. When you do this the difference between them will be one-half cent a hundred pounds. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRIS. Now let me ask the gentleman a question there. If you take your Hamburg sugar to San Francisco have you not to add the same freight?

Mr. LONG. Certainly. You must add the difference in freight. Mr. MORRIS. Which you say is 37½ cents.

Mr. LONG. You take it away from the market when you do that. Mr. MORRIS. Is not San Francisco the market for the Honolulu sugar?

Mr. LONG. Not for all of it. Only a small portion of it can be disposed of in San Francisco. There is but a limited market at San Francisco. The beet sugar produced in California almost fills up that market, and the surplus Hawaiian sugar must go to New York.

Mr. MORRIS. But you are figuring the freights across the continent. Now, if you compare the prices at New York for Hamburg sugar, then you want to compare the prices in San Francisco. Charge your freight one way the same as you do in the other.

Mr. LONG. I am not adding the freight across the continent. Mr. MORRIS. You do.

Mr. LONG. I am not. The difference between the San Francisco market price and the New York market price is not the difference in freight between San Francisco and New York, but it is the difference in freight between Honolulu and New York and Honolulu and San Francisco, which is 37½ cents a hundred pounds.

Mr. MORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. LONG (continuing). You have taken the Hawaiian sugar to San Francisco only, and you add 15 cents a hundred for freight. You should take the sugar to New York and add 52½ cents.

Mr. MORRIS. And I have only taken my Hamburg sugar to New York.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. And you must put both sugars in the same place to make a fair comparison—you must have them in the same market.

So much for the gentleman's figures. They are the most misleading, when analyzed, of any that I have seen since the Fifty-fourth Congress, when the gentleman's predecessor, Mr. Towne, stood in that aisle and for two hours and a half argued that the price of silver always controlled the price of wheat and other products. He made that argument amid applause on both sides of this Chamber.

But the gentleman himself knows that argument was fallacious, and the American people have declared at every election since that time that they did not believe it. The figures of the present gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] are just as unreliable on this sugar question as were the figures and the arguments of his predecessor on silver.

There is a great similarity between the sugar question and the silver question. There were a number of international conferences on silver. There have been more on sugar. There were four on silver. There have been twelve on sugar. The twelfth has just adjourned at Brussels. All these conferences have been upon the question of abolishing the bounties on sugar.

CUBANS HOLDING SUGAR HOPING FOR RELIEF.

If the sugar trust or any other corporation should purchase all the Cuban sugars before this law is enacted, then they would receive the benefit of the reduction this year. If the price of sugar in this country is lowered as a result of the concession on Cuban sugars, the Cuban planter is not benefited and this legislation would be in vain. On the other hand, if there is no fall in the price of sugar there is no question that the owner of the sugar at the time of the passage of the law will get the benefit of whatever concession is made.

The statement has been made that sugar has but one buyer in New York, and that is the American Sugar Refining Company, or popularly known as the "sugar trust." In the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means it was developed that the different refineries belonging to the sugar trust have a capacity of 40,000 barrels daily, and that the ten independent refineries in the different parts of the country have a capacity of 20,000 barrels per day. The sugar trust refines about five-eighths of the sugar of this country, and the independent refineries, about three-eighths. These refineries are the purchasers of the raw sugar, and of course they buy it as cheap as possible; but it is not a fact that there is no competition in raw sugar, for the competition at times is very active and determined.

To show that the Cuban sugar producer thoroughly understands the situation and is endeavoring to hold his crop until this legislation becomes effective, note the fact that although this year's crop is much larger than that of last year, yet the amount of sugar from Cuba that has been placed upon the market is much less. Last year, from January 1 to April 1, 198,129 tons had been received in the United States. This year during the same period but 89,713 tons have come to the United States. Last year on April 1 there was a stock of 237,000 tons in Cuba. This year the stock amounts to 420,000 tons. It is evident that the Cuban crop is being held awaiting our action, and the important question is, To whom does it belong?

SITUATION INVESTIGATED BY GOVERNOR-GENERAL WOOD.

On March 25 the following cablegram was sent by General Wood, while he was in Washington, to Acting Governor-General Scott, in Havana:

It is important to know the exact facts about the ownership of this year's sugar crop. Present solution of Cuban reciprocity threatened by allegation that large amount already sold or contracted to be sold to the American Sugar Refining Company. Many Congressmen willing to allow concessions for next year, because they understand that American Sugar Refining Company will gain benefit by any concession covering this year's crop. Therefore, I wish you would find out definitely, as soon as possible, how much of present year's crop has been sold and delivered, how much has been contracted for but not yet delivered, how much is pledged as security for loans, and whether the American Sugar Refining Company or any American purchaser have options on the present crop, and if so, to what extent.

Also how much sugar of this year's crop has been exported from Cuba to date, especially to the United States. It is suggested that you get definite reports from the some 164 "centrals" that are now reported to be grinding, and also from reliable commission houses, and that this information be tabulated and furnished the War Department, and that you request all these different sources to immediately advise you thereafter of any change covering sales or contracts that may be made in the future, and that you tabulate this information from time to time and cable War Department accordingly.

WOOD.

To this cablegram the following reply has been received:

[Copy of cablegram received at War Department April 2, 1902, and the figures given in bags (320 pounds) reduced to tons (2,240 pounds).]

HABANA, April 2, 1902.

EDWARDS, War Department, Washington:

Telegrams sent to 194 sugar centrals, to which 126 answers have been received to date, also telegrams to 36 Cuban banking firms, to which 34 replies have been received.

Figures, according to replies received, as follows:

	Bags of 320 pounds.	Tons of 2,240 pounds.
Output for the year to March 25.....	4,089,814	584,259
Amount actually in hands of planters.....	1,522,325	217,561
Sold and delivered to island firms.....	1,364,395	194,913
Contracted for in island and not yet delivered.....	305,048	43,578
Pledged as security for loans in island, but not sold.....	1,646,585	235,222
Held at option of the American Sugar Refining Co.....	23,000	3,285
Held at option of other American purchasers.....	16,000	2,285
Exported to the United States.....	182,652	25,646

All sugar above mentioned, except that at the option of American Sugar Refining Company and other American purchasers, is in the hands of Cuban planters and Cuban and Spanish commission houses doing business in the island of Cuba and is not at the option of anyone. Where held as security for loans advanced to planters the planters will get the advantage of any rise in the price under conditions of deposit, as is the custom in the island. This statement shows conclusively the absolute falsity of the declarations that the sugar trusts have control of considerable portion of Cuban sugar crop. Other statements will be furnished as soon as possible.

WOOD, Military Governor.

On April 7, 1902, the following cablegram was received at the War Department:

HABANA, April 7, 1902.

EDWARDS, War Department, Washington:

Reference your telegram to-day, telegrams sent to 194 sugar centrals, as previously reported in my telegram 2d instant. Ten additional replies received since, which report as follows:

	Long tons.
Output for the year.....	24,755
Amount in hands of planters.....	13,260
Sold and delivered.....	11,311
Contracted for with island firms, but not delivered.....	3,019
Pledged as security for loans in island, but not sold.....	1,546

All sugar above mentioned is in hands of planters and Cuban and Spanish commission houses doing business in the island with exception of 2,398 long tons exported to United States. None at option of American Sugar Refining Company nor other American purchasers. Where held as security for loans planters will get advantage of rise in price as stated in telegram 2d instant. Two remaining banking firms replied: "Do not make loans on sugar." Above amounts should be added to my cable of April 2. No change in situation.

WOOD, Military Governor.

Adding the data of these two cablegrams, we have the following totals:

Answers from 136 centrals out of 194 in the island; and 36 banking firms out of 36:

	Tons.
Output for the year to March 25, 1902.....	699,014
Left in the hands of the planters.....	230,821
Sold and delivered to island firms.....	205,224
Contracted for in the island and not yet delivered.....	46,597
Pledged as security for loans in the island, but not yet sold.....	235,768
Held at the option of the American Sugar Refining Company.....	3,285
Held at the option of other American purchasers.....	2,285
Exported to the United States.....	28,014

LARGE SURPLUS SUGAR STOCKS CAUSE DEPRESSION.

It is well known that general distress and imminent bankruptcy exist in all cane-sugar-producing countries. This is due to the fact that cane sugar has been unable to compete with the bounty-fed beet sugar of Europe. It is hoped that the convention signed by the Brussels conference on March 5, 1902, will be more successful in the abolition of the bounty systems of Europe than those that have preceded it. If the purposes of this conference are attained, and all direct and indirect bounties are abolished, the sugar industry in cane-producing countries may be rescued from total destruction.

The convention does not go into effect until September 1, 1903, and until that time there can be no possible change in the situation. There will still be a large stock of surplus sugar on hand on October 1, 1903. The following is an estimate made by Willet & Gray of the stocks of sugars in the principal countries from October 1, 1899, to October 1, 1903:

	Tons.
Stock in principal countries October 1, 1899.....	661,420
World's production, 1899-1900.....	8,455,951
Total supply, campaign 1899-1900.....	9,117,380
World's consumption, campaign 1899-1900.....	8,812,960
Stock October 1, 1900.....	304,420
World's production, 1900-1901.....	9,648,243
Total supply.....	9,952,663
World's consumption, campaign 1900-1901.....	9,230,308
Stock in principal countries October 1, 1901.....	722,355
Estimated world's production, 1901-2.....	10,762,756
Estimated total supply.....	11,485,111
Estimated consumption, campaign 1901-2.....	9,630,000
Estimated stock in principal countries October 1, 1902.....	1,855,111
Estimated world's production, 1902-3.....	10,184,631
Estimated total supply.....	12,039,742
Estimated consumption, campaign 1902-3.....	10,000,000
Estimated stock in principal countries October 1, 1903.....	2,009,742

It is estimated that there will be an average reduction of 10 or 15 per cent in European sowings; but the prices of beet roots have been reduced in Austria to $3.05 a ton, in central Germany to $3.90, and to $3.42 in eastern Prussia. At these prices the manufacturers will be able to produce sugar cheaper than formerly.

HAMBURG CONTROLS WORLD'S SUGAR PRICES.

Hamburg controls the price of sugar throughout the world because Germany is the largest exporter of both raw and refined sugars. The New York duty-paid price of all sugars, whether they come from Java, Hawaii, Brazil, Cuba, Porto Rico, or Germany, can be ascertained accurately any day in the year by taking the Hamburg price as a basis. To this must be added the freight and other fixed charges, the regular duty and then the countervailing duty, which equals the bounty paid by Germany. The total of these figures will be the New York duty-paid price. Occasionally there are breaks in the market when for a few days the New York price will be below the Hamburg price, or the Hamburg price below the New York price, but the parity is soon restored.

The price for which sugar will sell in any other country for importation to the United States can be ascertained by taking the New York price thus established and deducting therefrom the freight from such country, the fixed charges, and the duty, if any. Thus all these prices are based upon and regulated by the Hamburg price.

BRUSSELS CONFERENCE AND BOUNTIES.

It is evident that the abolishment of direct bounties alone will not affect the New York price of sugar. Germany pays an export bounty of 26 cents per 100 pounds on raw sugar and 38 cents on refined; but under the Dingley law we levy and collect a countervailing duty of these same amounts upon them. April 1, 1902, raw sugar was selling for export at Hamburg for $1.40 per hundred pounds.

The exporter received a bounty of 26 cents from the German Government on every hundred pounds he shipped to New York, but he had to pay this 26 cents into the United States Treasury as a countervailing duty, over and above the regular customs duty. The moment Germany ceases to pay this export bounty we will cease to collect the countervailing duty. If the exporter can still afford to sell his sugar at Hamburg for $1.40 a hundred he can lay it down in New York, duty paid, for 26 cents a hundred less than he can now, because he has 26 cents a hundred less duty to pay. Or he can raise his Hamburg price 26 cents, from $1.40 to $1.66, and still sell his sugar in New York at the same price he does now, because he has that 26 cents less duty to pay. The New York refiner would get his sugar for the same old price and the Hamburg exporter would get the same amount of money for his goods. The difference would be that the German Government would not have to pay that 26 cents bounty and our Government would lose the 26 cents now collected as countervailing duty. The countervailing duties collected on bounty-fed sugars during the fiscal year 1901 amounted to $2,147,956.09.

The agreement reached by the sugar conference was announced February 28, and the next day the Hamburg price of raw sugar fell 3 cents per hundred. Prices can not possibly advance materially until after the present surplus and the surplus from next year's campaign shall have been absorbed. Irrespective of what the final results of such a readjustment may be, it is certain that the effect for the next year or two will be a tendency toward low prices in sugars due to the pressure of the immense stocks of sugar throughout the world.

DUTIES, SURTAX AND CARTEL OF GERMANY.

Germany imposes customs duties amounting in the aggregate to $4.328 per 100 pounds on foreign sugars. This duty is absolutely prohibitive. A tax of $2.18 a hundred is imposed upon all sugar consumed within the Empire. The surtax which is to be reduced to a uniform figure by the countries interested is the difference between the import duty and the consumption tax. A reduction of this surtax would not affect the export price of sugar at Hamburg directly. Would it do so indirectly? If it does, it must be through the effect of this reduction of the surtax on the cartel. And what is the cartel?

The cartel of Germany is a comparatively new institution. It has been in operation since June 1, 1900, only; but it is fashioned closely after the cartel of Austria, which has been in very successful operation since 1890. Volume XVIII of the Report of the Industrial Commission, published as House Document No. 187 of the present Congress, is devoted to industrial combinations in Europe. It contains lucid explanations of the cartels of Austria and Germany.

The German Government controls the output of German sugar absolutely. The total amount of sugar to be produced each year is fixed. The percentage of refining to be allowed to each refiner is determined. The amount of raw sugar that each manufacturer may sell to refiners and export is specified. The Government exercises this supervision over the industry in order to regulate and limit the bounties that it may be called upon to pay. But, as a matter of fact, the production has regularly fallen short of the contingent fixed by the Government, except the last crop. The Government limitation for the sugar year ending September 30, 1900, was 1,889,319 tons of raw sugar. The production for that year was 1,791,250 tons, or 98,069 tons short of the contingent. Aside from these regulations the Government does not participate in the workings of the cartel.

MAGDEBURG AND HAMBURG PRICES.

It may be well to study the cartel from the results it produces. Magdeburg is the market for both refined and raw sugars for German consumption. Hamburg is the export market for both. German refiners pay Magdeburg prices for raw sugars. Foreign refiners pay Hamburg prices. German wholesale merchants can buy refined sugars at Magdeburg prices only. Exporters pay Hamburg prices for the same sugars. On April 1, 1902, the selling prices of raw sugar was $1.70 per 100 pounds at Magdeburg, and $1.40 at Hamburg. The selling prices of refined sugar were $6.04 at Magdeburg and $1.83 at Hamburg. This is the work of the cartel.

All the raw sugar produced in Germany last year was sold either at Magdeburg to the refiners or at Hamburg for export. All this sugar cost $1.80 per 100 pounds to produce. The part of it disposed of at Magdeburg sold for $1.70, or a loss of 10 cents per 100 pounds. The part of it sold at Hamburg for export brought $1.40 per 100 pounds, or 40 cents below the cost of production. Yet the raw sugar manufacturers of Germany made $6,702,428 on these sales. A combination that can take sugar that cost $1.80 and sell part of it at one place for $1.70 and the remainder for $1.40 and still make $6,702,428 out of the business—

Mr. OTEY. How did they do it?

Mr. LONG. I will explain, if the gentleman will have patience.

Mr. METCALF. That is simply the surplus raw sugar that is sold below cost?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; it is all their raw sugar. That portion of it which was sold for export brought $1.40 per 100 pounds. That was the exact export price on the 1st day of April. It ranged a little higher than that last year.

Mr. METCALF. But you limit it to the sugar sold for export?

Mr. LONG. This is the sugar sold for export. The rest of it was sold at Magdeburg for $1.70, but all of it cost $1.80.

REFINERS FURNISH THE CARTEL WITH FUNDS

The cartel is composed of two syndicates. Refiners of sugar comprise one; the manufacturers of raw sugar the other. Those concerns that manufacture refined sugar direct from the beet belong to each syndicate. These two syndicates have agreed upon $2.78 a hundred as the normal inland price of raw sugar.

The refiners' syndicate guarantees this price to the manufacturers of raw sugar, unless it falls below $2.04. The manufacturer of raw sugar is required to sell his product for the best price obtainable. If this price be $2.78 or better, the refiners' syndicate pays him nothing. If it be less than $2.78, the refiners pay him the difference between that price, whatever it may be, and $2.78, with one limitation. The refiners do not "margin" the raw sugar below $2.04. If it sells for $2.40 the refiners pay the other 38 cents per hundred, so as to bring the price up to $2.78. If it sells for $2.04, they pay 74 cents per hundred. But this is the limit. No matter how much it falls below $2.04 the payment out of the cartel is only 74 cents.

Where does the refiner get the funds with which to pay this "cartel" to the manufacturers of raw sugar? Every month each member of the refiners' syndicate pays into the treasury of his syndicate the difference between the average Magdeburg price for raw sugar and $2.78 during the past month, provided always that this difference is not greater than 74 cents. He pays this amount upon each 100 pounds of refined sugar he has produced for home consumption during said month. To this amount 10 per cent is added for the expenses of the cartel. The entire sum thus collected is known as the kartellnutzen, or "combination advantage." With raw sugar below $2.04 at Magdeburg, as it is now, the refiner pays the full margin of 74 cents plus the 10 per cent, or 81.5 cents, on each 100 pounds of refined sugar produced by him for home consumption.

RAW SUGAR MANUFACTURERS' PROFITS AND LOSSES.

It costs $1.80 a hundred to produce raw beet sugar in Germany, without profit, according to the International Sugar Journal for April, 1900. During the last sugar year the manufacturers of raw sugar sold a total of 1,375,000 tons of raw sugar to the refiners at Magdeburg prices. The present Magdeburg price is $1.70. On this basis they lost 10 cents per hundred, or an aggregate of $3,080,000 on this sugar, to start with. But the refiners manufactured 691,000 tons of refined sugar for home consumption out of this raw sugar. On this 691,000 tons of refined sugar they paid the raw sugar manufacturers a cartel allowance of 74 cents per 100 pounds. This amounted to $11,453,916. Deducting the $3,080,000 loss at the time of sale from this amount, the net profit of the raw sugar manufacturers on their Magdeburg business is found to be $8,373,916 for the year.

But the manufacturers of raw sugar lost part of this profit on their export business. Their sugar cost $1.80 per hundred. The present Hamburg or export price is $1.40, which means a loss of 40 cents a hundred. Here, however, they get an export bounty of 26 cents per hundred, so their net loss on their export business is only 14 cents per hundred. The raw-sugar manufacturers exported 533,000 tons during the last sugar year. A loss of 14 cents per hundred on this amount is $1,671,488. Deducting this amount from the net gain of $8,373,916 at Magdeburg leaves $6,702,428 as net gain on the year's total business. This is an average of 19.6 cents per hundred on the total production of 1,908,000 tons of raw sugar.

REFINERS' CARTEL PROFITS AND LOSSES.

From what source does the refiner get back this 81.5 cents per 100? To-day he pays $1.70 for his raw sugar. Assume that the cost of refining sugar is 62.5 cents, the same as in this country. His refined sugar then stands him at $2.325 per 100 pounds. They sold part of this refined sugar at Hamburg for export for $1.83 per 100 pounds, or 49 cents less than it cost them, and yet they made almost $10,000,000 on their year's business.

Mr. OTEY. That is another wonderful shuffle that I do not understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Where did they make their money? That is what the gentleman from Virginia is very anxious to know?

Mr. OTEY. It is.

Mr. LONG. I will tell you where they made it. Take a given hundred pounds of this refined sugar and note the difference in selling it for domestic consumption and for export. If sold for consumption, the refiner must pay 81.5 cents into the cartel and $2.164 consumption tax. It then costs him $5.804. He sells it at Magdeburg for $6.04. His profit is 73.6 cents per hundred.

Mr. OTEY. He is robbing somebody. Who is it?

Mr. LONG. They are all robbing the German consumer. But what happens if the refiner sells at Hamburg for export? His sugar has cost him $2.325. He sells for $1.83. His first loss is 49.5 cents per hundred. But this is not all loss. The German Government pays him a bounty of 38 cents per hundred. This reduces his actual loss to 11.5 cents per hundred. On all the sugar he sells at Magdeburg for domestic consumption he makes 73.6 cents a hundred. On all he sells at Hamburg for export he loses 11.5 cents per hundred. Last sugar year ending September 30, 1901, the German refiners sold 691,000 tons of refined sugar at Magdeburg for home consumption. A profit of 73.6 cents per 100 pounds on this amount of sugar is $11,392,102. They sold 547,000 tons at Hamburg for export. A loss of 11.5 cents per 100 pounds on this amount of sugar is $1,409,072. In other words, the cartel made $11,392,102 for the German refiners on their Magdeburg business and lost them $1,409,072 on their Hamburg business. On all their business they made $9,983,030 by the workings of the cartel and were still enabled to throw away $1,409,072 in an effort to crush all competition on refined sugar.

GERMAN CONSUMERS FORCED TO MAINTAIN CARTEL.

These calculations are based upon the Magdeburg and Hamburg prices of April 1, 1902, which are lower than the ruling prices of the past year. With the prices higher, the profits arising from the cartel are greater for both the refiners and raw-sugar manufacturers.

The entire cartel system is dependent for its success and stability upon the exorbitantly high price which it compels the German consumer to pay for refined sugar. This price is now, and for some time has been, $6.04 per 100 pounds. The actual cost of refined sugar to the refiner is $2.325 to-day. But the refiner must pay the German Government a tax of $2.164 per 100 pounds on all he sells for home consumption. This would make the actual cost of such sugar $4.489. The difference, $1.551, between this figure and $6.04, the present selling price, represents the $0.815 paid into the cartel and the $0.736 refiner's profit. The German refiners are enabled to keep the price of refined sugar up to $6.04 only by reason of the large surtax. This surtax is the difference between the rate of duty or taxation to which foreign sugars are subjected and that imposed upon the home product. The German import duty is now $4.328 per 100 pounds on all sugars; the consumption tax $2.164; hence the present surtax is $2.164 per 100 pounds on refined sugars. This tax is prohibitive. No foreign sugars are imported into Germany.

This is the game that the Cuban is playing against. This is the game that some Republicans are indorsing when they favor striking off the differential and reducing the duty on refined sugar. They favor the admission of the bounty-fed refined sugar of Europe. They favor transferring the refining business from this country to Germany, where this infamous cartel exists. They would make it so there would be no market here for Cuban sugar; for if there were no refineries here, there would be no purchasers of raw sugar. They would destroy the cane sugar of Cuba and Louisiana. They would destroy the refining industry and the beet-sugar industry of the United States and turn the production of sugar over to this German trust or cartel that has monopolized the sugar industry of Europe and fixed the world's price of sugar below the cost of production.

Mr. OTEY. The "game" that you speak of is carried on, as I understand, in this country under the present Dingley law. That is about as fair as the German "game," is it not?

Mr. LONG. In what respect?

Mr. OTEY. You spoke of the kind of "game" they are trying to play to deprive the producer in Germany—

Mr. LONG. Have you not in Virginia had good times for the past four years under the Dingley law?

Mr. OTEY. I do not know.

Mr. LONG. Have not the people of Virginia been reasonably prosperous and happy under the Dingley law?

Mr. OTEY. I think they would have been a great deal more prosperous if we had not had it.

Mr. LONG. You think so?

Mr. OTEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. You did not have this prosperity under the Wilson-Gorman law, did you? How did you get along in your State under that law?

Mr. OTEY. Well, times have changed a little since then, you know. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Yes; they have changed.

Mr. OTEY. We are growing a little, you know.

Mr. LONG. In this country we have never had anything which compared with the cartel of Germany. The Brussels conference has agreed on a convention which will go into effect September 1, 1903. Whether that convention will destroy the cartel is a very grave question. We shall know more about it when it has become effective.

Mr. OTEY. The gentleman spoke a few moments ago of the kind of "game" that was being played on the German consumers, or words to that effect. He said it was the same kind of a "game" that some Republicans on this side of the House were trying to play. Now, I want to know what he meant by that?

Mr. LONG. The gentleman has been on the Republican side so little that he does not understand my language. [Laughter.]

Mr. OTEY. I may not understand the language of the gentleman, but I am trying to get a little enlightenment. When he spoke of the "game" I asked him what was the object of that game. He said, if I recollect correctly, that that is the "game" they are playing on the consumers of sugar in Germany.

A MEMBER. The gentleman was referring to Cuba.

Mr. OTEY. Oh, no; the "game" in Germany. And then he said: "That is the kind of game that some Republicans on this side of the House are playing on Cuba," or wanted to play on Cuba. That is what I understood.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. OTEY. Then say it again, so that I may understand what you mean.

Mr. LONG. I will do so for the gentleman's benefit. I called attention to the operation of the cartel in Germany; I said that there are some Republicans who have threatened to join with the Democrats—

Mr. OTEY. That is what you said in the first part of your remarks. I am trying to get at what you said later, when you spoke about the "game."

Mr. LONG. I said there are some Republicans who threaten to vote with the Democrats to strike off the differential on sugar. They want to strike off the differential and turn the refining business of this country over to the cartel of Germany and let foreigners do the refining. They want to kill the refining industry in this country and destroy the market for Cuban raw sugar, for Cuban sugar must first be refined. They would destroy our beet-sugar industry and leave us at the mercy of the German cartel system. That is what I said.

Mr. OTEY. Very well, then.

Mr. LONG. I have not time to pursue further this question of the German cartel.

Mr. OTEY. Take all the time you want. Everybody will give you all the time you want. It is very interesting, and I would like to know something more about it.

Mr. LONG. I am pleased to know that I am not wearying the gentleman.

Mr. OTEY. You are not wearying me at all, sir; I am glad to hear you.

Mr. LONG. I will be as brief as possible.

IS THE TRADE OF CUBA DESIRABLE?

Another consideration pertaining to every reciprocity agreement should be to endeavor to secure something in return for any concession that may be made. Will any benefit come to the people of the United States, to any of our domestic industries, from reciprocity with Cuba? Let us look into conditions in Cuba and the possibilities of Cuban trade. Let us see what we have already and what we can obtain by securing special concessions to us in the Cuban tariff.

The position is taken by some members of the House that Cuba should be given charity, that there is distress there, and that we should relieve it, as we would make appropriation for those who have had their property destroyed by floods on the Mississippi River.

This is not my idea of the basis on which we should legislate on this question. I favor reciprocity with Cuba because I believe it will be helpful to the people of Cuba; but I also believe we will get an adequate return.

I think that phase of the question demands more attention than it has received in this House. What Cuba wants is not charity. It is not a gift; it is not bounty. Cuba wants an opportunity to live. It wants to make an exchange of products with us; it wants to give us the trade of that island in return for concessions on sugar and tobacco that will not injure in the remotest degree any of our domestic industries.

Mr. Place, one of the Cuban delegates, in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, said (p. 408, Hearings):

Now, gentlemen, the Cuban representatives are fighting their own cause on its own merits. For every dollar we ask from you we are willing to give you another one.

Is appears to me what we have been looking for has not been well understood. We beg your assistance for our products, and in compensation we want you to secure the trade of Cuba.

If we secure the trade of Cuba, what will we get?

RESULTS OF CUBAN RECIPROCITY IN 1891-1894.

We had reciprocity with Cuba under the McKinley law from September 1, 1891 to August 27, 1894. Under that law we admitted sugar, molasses, coffee, and hides free, and in consideration of the free admission of these articles into the United States Spain agreed that certain articles which were the product and manufacture of the United States should be admitted into Cuba free, others at a reduction of 50 per cent of the regular rates, and others still at a reduction of 25 per cent. We thus have had an object lesson showing the benefits to the United States of reciprocity with Cuba.

In 1891, the last complete fiscal year before the agreement went into effect, our total exports to Cuba amounted to $12,224,888. In 1893, the first complete fiscal year after the agreement was in force, our exports amounted to $24,157,698. In 1896, the first complete fiscal year after the agreement was abrogated, our exports to Cuba had fallen to $7,530,880. Our exports of corn to Cuba in 1891 were valued at $220,187. In 1893 they had risen to $592,050, and in 1896 they had fallen to $93,201. We sold Cuba wheat flour in 1891 of the value of $591,836, in 1893, $2,821,557, and in 1896 our exports of wheat flour had fallen to $647,057. Our total exports of breadstuffs to Cuba in 1891 were $874,979. In 1893, under reciprocity, they had increased to $3,512,207, while in 1896, after reciprocity, they had fallen to $896,673.

Before reciprocity, in 1891, we sold Cuba bacon and hams to the value of $586,413. In 1893, under reciprocity, our total exports of these articles to Cuba amounted to $1,317,829. In 1896, after reciprocity, we sold Cuba of these articles $734,540. We sold Cuba lard of the value of $2,079,534 in 1891, increased this amount to $4,023,970 under reciprocity, and had it reduced again in 1896, after reciprocity, to $1,551,185. Our total meat and dairy products sold to Cuba in 1891 amounted to $2,787,608, and in 1893, under reciprocity, the total value of these products taken from us by Cuba amounted to $5,700,536. In 1896, after the destruction of reciprocity by the Wilson-Gorman tariff law, Cuba bought of us only $2,166,677 of such products.

Our trade with Cuba under McKinley reciprocity is all the more remarkable when considered in connection with our foreign trade of that period. There was a marked falling off in our exports in 1893 as compared with 1891. This was especially true with reference to all Latin-American countries and the West Indies, excepting Cuba. Nicaragua, Honduras, and Brazil were disturbed by insurrections, which materially decreased the foreign commerce. An extraordinary succession of poor crops had reduced the purchasing power of other Central and South American countries to the minimum. A period of financial and commercial depression, unprecedented in its severity, prevailed throughout all countries where silver was the standard currency. The Mexican dollar, the standard in Cuba, fell in value and purchasing power from about 76 cents in gold, in 1891, to about 56 cents, in 1893. Other nations suffered in their trade just as we did. In 1893 the London Chamber of Commerce, the greatest commercial body in the world, presented a memorial to the British Government setting forth the deplorable condition of the foreign trade of Great Britain, and asking that the International Monetary Conference be reassembled, in the hope of finding some remedy for existing conditions. Our total exports fell from $884,480,810, in 1891, to $847,665,194, in 1893. But our exports to Cuba jumped from $12,224,888, in 1891, to $24,157,698, in 1893, notwithstanding the fact that it then took three Mexican dollars to pay the bills that two settled in 1891. Our total exports rose again to $882,606,938 in 1896. But reciprocity with Cuba was at an end. Cuban prosperity had departed. Our exports to that island were only $7,530,880. The same is true with other countries with which we had reciprocity at that time. While our exports to the world at large were decreasing, we sold more and more, year after year, to the countries with which we had reciprocity. When reciprocity ceased, our trade with these countries dwindled away.

Certainly reciprocity with Cuba under the McKinley law was a benefit and not an injury to the United States. The trade of Cuba is not large compared with that of some European countries, but the advantage to the United States comes from the fact that she consumes articles which we produce in abundance and for which we must find a foreign market. Her industries are largely confined to sugar and tobacco, and by the admission of these products at a reasonable concession we obtain the entire market of Cuba for products that we produce in abundance, and of which our surplus must be, of necessity, disposed of abroad.

WHAT HAS CUBA TO OFFER?

If we secure the trade of Cuba, what will we obtain that we do not now possess?

Last year, under the present military tariff, we practically had all of the trade of Cuba in corn, wheat, flour, and other breadstuffs; but Cuba also imported cattle and animals to the amount of $8,476,509, of which only $1,994,218 came from the United States. Cuba imported dairy products to the amount of $1,071,711, of which only $491,318 came from the United States. Cuba imported meats and meat products to the amount of $8,791,689, of which only $666,211 came from the United States. Cuba imported oils, grease, and paraffin to the amount of $2,598,938, of which only $713,737 came from the United States. Cuba imported cotton, and manufactures of, to the amount of $6,068,241, of which only $464,816 came from the United States. Cuba imported iron and steel, and manufactures of, to the amount of $4,799,216, of which only $3,403,607 came from the United States. Cuba imported of boots and shoes $1,638,084, of which only $405,682 came from the United States.

Of the articles that are distinctly those of the farm, the importations of Cuba last year were $24,371,808; of which only $12,137,708 came from the United States.

The total imports of Cuba for the last fiscal year amounted to $65,050,141; of which only $28,078,702 came from the United States.

All the witnesses before the Committee on Ways and Means stated that with prosperity in Cuba the importations of that island would amount to $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 annually. This is the trade that Cuba offers to the United States in return for concessions on her products.

Is this charity? Is it not a good business bargain, viewed from the standpoint of the United States?

AN IDEAL OPPORTUNITY FOR RECIPROCITY.

The relations between this country and Cuba furnish an ideal opportunity for the establishment of reciprocal arrangements between the two countries. President McKinley, in his Buffalo speech, said:

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus.

He also said:

We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our entire industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. * * * Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

Cuba, therefore, answers every definition and complies with every requisite which reciprocity demands. I have shown that reciprocity is Republican doctrine, and I have argued this question upon that assumption, without referring to the fact that we are under any obligations to Cuba growing out of the war with Spain. I have discussed it simply as a good trade arrangement such as we had under the McKinley law and such as we said in our national platform of 1896 should be extended and enlarged. In stating that it is Republican doctrine I have the support of the able chairman of the committee [Mr. PAYNE], who in his report on this bill says:

Aside from the exceptional case that Cuba presents, the action of the committee is in entire accord with the reciprocity doctrine of the Republican platform and the declarations of President McKinley and President Roosevelt. It involves no proposed revision of the tariff or anything not entirely in harmony with the maintenance of the protective system.

Joining in that report are the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], another strong protectionist, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who in his speech yesterday indorsed the doctrine of reciprocity as I have been arguing it this afternoon.

IS RECIPROCITY DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINE?

Is it Democratic doctrine? On that I am in doubt. I am left in doubt by the various reports filed by the Democratic members of the committee. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] who is a high protectionist on sugar and a freetrader on everything else, has this to say in regard to reciprocity as contained in this bill:

It seems to me that this kind of reciprocity is absolutely impossible under a Democratic tariff. Should the tariff ever be revised on the line and plane of the principles of the Democratic party, reciprocity would be entirely unnecessary and impossible, as the rates would not be prohibitive, and the extension of our trade would as a natural consequence flow from the imposition of such tariff rates without the necessity of reciprocity.

That is one Democrat. Here is another. Here is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER], another member of the committee, who never lets go by an opportunity to seek light and information in regard to any Democratic tariff, and who seems to be especially anxious this afternoon to get information on the differentials. Here is what he says in his report on this bill:

It inaugurates the policy of reciprocity, which, as now advocated by the Republican party, is as un-Democratic as a tariff for protection, and which has been aptly called the "handmaiden of protection." The Democratic view has always been that tariffs should be laid fairly and equitably to raise revenue for the support of the Government. It is as much a perversion of the taxing power to use it as a means to dicker and barter with other countries as it is to use it to protect favored industries against foreign competition. Tariffs should be framed for revenue and should be applied to all nations alike, enabling them to trade with us upon terms of equality.

Here comes another Democratic member of the committee, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]; a new leader of the Democratic party; a gentleman who does not hesitate to lead the party simply because he is a new member of it; a gentleman who in the Fifty-sixth Congress was registered in the Congressional Directory as a Silverite, but who always acted with the Democrats in that Congress. I am proud to say, speaking a good word for the Congressional Directory, that it has finally caught up with the procession, and now the gentleman from Nevada is registered under his true colors, as a Democrat. Here is what he has to say as a leader of his party, a leader who is trying to lead it into favoring the forcible annexation of Cuba:

Nor should the tariff reformer be misled by the suggestion of reciprocity. Reciprocity does not mean free trade. It means the extension of the policy of protection to other countries. It makes the trade of the world subject to the varying treaties made by the different countries of the world, each country seeking to obtain an advantage, each country seeking to favor some and to discriminate against others. * * * The Democratic party, therefore, should, in my judgment, take strong grounds against reciprocal treaties of any kind.

These are three eminent Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee who have taken strong ground against this bill, because they say it is not good Democratic doctrine. But there are others. I now refer to the report of that other leader of the Democratic party, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. I do not want the members of this House to be confused by my references to the various leaders of the Democratic party. It is well known that they have several. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] has supported this bill from the beginning, and has assisted very materially in its progress up to this time. What does the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who does me the honor to listen to me at this time, say in his report?

Thomas Jefferson, whose Democracy is unquestioned, was the first American to preach the doctrine of reciprocity. The first treaty of reciprocity was negotiated by Franklin Pierce, a Democratic President, with the Dominion of Canada. The Hawaiian treaty of reciprocity was renewed by a Democratic President, Grover Cleveland. The Democratic platform of 1882 proclaimed the Democratic doctrine of reciprocity. Republican leaders have torn a leaf from the gospels of Democracy, as written by the Democratic evangelist, Thomas Jefferson, and tried to copyright it as a new dispensation of Republican dogma. The reciprocal feature of this bill may well cause Republicans to hesitate, for it is the purest, most unadulterated Democracy.

While we may differ on this side as to reciprocity and what it means, our differences do not, in variety, compare with the differences of the Democratic party on this proposition. While the gentleman from New York had no Democrat to join him in these views, neither did any of the other Democrats who filed minority reports. They were utterly unable to get the consent of any of their colleagues on the committee to any of the propositions they advanced unless they were stated in their own language.

But the gentleman from New York has distinguished support, for when the bill was voted upon in the committee he was gratified to behold marching under his banner, the banner of reciprocity as he upheld it, the Democratic leader [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee] and that other distinguished Democrat from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

While the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] abides within the shadow of Wall street, and many of his constituents may be interested in the sugar trust, yet he is supported in his position on this bill by that distinguished Democrat from the plains of Nebraska, sitting in his editorial sanctum.

Mr. MANN. Or his barn. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Or his barn. That great leader of the Democracy, that defeated but not abandoned leader of the Democracy, writes editorials on this question that have been put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] in indorsement of his position.

So, I say to Democrats, I say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OREY], you can take your choice as to what the true Democratic doctrine is and whether you are a good Democrat when you support this bill.

But there is a higher ground than this. It does not surprise me that there are Democrats supporting this measure. I recall the fact that when the intervention resolution was passed every member of this House, Democrats and Republicans, except six, voted for it. When it went to the Senate, it was supported by Republicans and by Democrats. If it had received only Republican votes in the Senate, it would have been defeated. When the war was over and the treaty of peace had been made and was submitted to the Senate, I recall that it was ratified only with the aid of Democratic votes. As this bill deals with a question that has grown out of the war with Spain, I am not surprised, though it was recommended by a Republican President, that yet it is receiving the support of Democrats as well as Republicans.

OPPOSITION'S CHANGE OF POSITION.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If it will not disturb the gentleman, I was called out of the Chamber and deprived of hearing a part of the gentleman's entertaining speech. I want to know if he touched upon the question as to about how much of the present sugar crop of Cuba is now in the hands of the people of that country?

Mr. LONG. I have quoted from and will put in the RECORD a statement from Governor-General Wood, giving the latest information as to the ownership of Cuban sugar. The opponents of this bill have changed their position on this question since the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] read the statement in his speech.

The claim before that was that the sugar trust owned all the sugar. The claim since has been that the sugar trust has refrained from purchasing sugar; that the sugar trust is awaiting the result of this legislation before purchasing largely. They sought to prove it by the annual statement of the sugar trust, which showed a large decrease in the amount of raw sugar on hand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To the extent of $10,000,000 short.

Mr. LONG. Yes; to the extent of $10,000,000. It is claimed they are waiting until after this bill becomes a law before they will purchase Cuban sugar.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I hope that is true as far as I am concerned.

Mr. LONG. That is the argument which the opponents of this bill have been using since the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] read the cablegram from General Wood, which I will insert in my remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the gentleman's theory as to why the American Sugar Refining Company is $10,000,000 short in its stock of raw sugar at this time?

Mr. LONG. The American Sugar Refining Company is conducted on a business basis. It would be a very unwise business concern that would buy sugar long in advance, considering the conditions of the sugar market the world over. The price of sugar has been fluctuating greatly during the past year, falling all the time. It has been uncertain what the price would be from one day to the next. It has changed from week to week and month to month under the operation of several influences, one being the sugar conference at Brussels; another, the imposition of duties on sugar in England, and still another, the great overproduction of sugar throughout the world.

They could not safely buy sugar at any price beyond their immediate demands. Sugar on the 1st day of April, in New York, was $3.62½ a hundred, and it is $3.37½ a hundred to-day. It has been fluctuating like that all winter, and of course no wise business concern would lay in a large supply of sugar under these circumstances.

Mr. PAYNE. Let me ask the gentleman if it has not advanced in price since the 1st of January?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not higher now than it was the 1st of January?

Mr. LONG. No; it is $3.37½ per hundred to-day, which is the low point during the past year. On the 1st of January it was $3.62½; on the 1st of February, $3.69; the 1st of March, $3.62½, and on the 1st of April $3.62½. In these various months it has gone up and come down to to-day's price several times before during the winter. It has been constantly fluctuating, not only here, but in Hamburg. This is caused by the immense stock of sugar on hand throughout the world, and other causes to which I have referred.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman does not concede then that this action on the part of the sugar trust is due wholly to its anticipation of the result of this legislation?

Mr. LONG. Not at all. The price of sugar is fixed in Hamburg, and the New York price will follow the Hamburg price in the future as it has in the past.

OUR RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

It may be well to refer to some recent history touching our relations with Cuba. In the intervention resolution at the beginning of the war with Spain we disclaimed any intention to exercise sovereignty or control over Cuba, except for the pacification of the island, and that when that was accomplished we would leave the government and control of Cuba to its people.

Under the Platt amendment we defined our relations with Cuba in detail.

The claim has been made in this debate that the United States received no benefit from the Platt amendment, but that the different provisions of this amendment were for Cuba alone, and entirely independent of any benefits to the United States. That this position is untenable is clearly shown from the language of the amendment itself.

The first clause of the amendment recognizes the Monroe doctrine, which we have insisted upon for so many years. It plainly says that Cuba will not authorize or permit any foreign power to obtain lodgment or control in any portion of the island. Is not this for the good of the United States? Are we not benefited by the assurance that the government of Cuba in its constitution, which is finally to be put into a permanent treaty, guarantees that no foreign power shall obtain lodgment in the island?

In the second clause Cuba agrees not to contract any public debt, to pay the interest on which, and to make reasonable sinking-fund provision for its discharge, the ordinary funds of the island after paying expenses are not adequate.

This, it is true, is for the benefit of Cuba, but it is also for our benefit in making doubly sure that no foreign power obtains control in Cuba. If Cuba had unlimited power to borrow money from foreign powers or their citizens, there might eventually arise serious complications when efforts were made to collect the debts.

While this clause is for the benefit of Cuba it may inure to our own advantage as well, and it has rendered it absolutely necessary that the government of Cuba shall have ample revenues to pay current expenses as well as to pay the interest and sinking fund on any indebtedness that may be contracted.

Cuba is a Latin country, and such countries have long been in the habit of supporting their governments out of the revenues received at the custom-houses. The taxes on real estate and personal property will not be sufficient to more than pay the expenses of the municipal and provincial governments. The general government of Cuba must be supported by the custom-houses.

Export duties should not be levied, as they will be an additional charge on sugar and tobacco. Import duties alone should produce the required revenue. The larger the imports, the more the revenues there will be to run the new government. The last fiscal year the total imports amounted to $66,264,767. The exports amounted to $64,245,801. If Cuba is prosperous and her exports increase to one hundred or to one hundred and fifty millions, her imports will increase to a similar amount. With the increase of her imports the revenues collected at the custom-houses will also increase. This is necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the Platt amendment.

It is certainly to the interest of the United States that there should be peace and order in Cuba instead of insurrection and disorder.

Clause 3 of the amendment gives to the United States the right to intervene not only for the preservation of Cuban independence, but for the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty. We will claim the right to determine when the conditions justify our intervention. We can insist that American citizens shall have equal protection of the law in any country where they may temporarily abide, but no other country but Cuba has agreed to accord us the right to intervene when the existing government is unable to protect the life, property, and individual liberty of its own citizens.

It is to the interest of the United States that our Southern cities should be kept free from a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases. Since the American occupation in Cuba, Havana and the other cities in Cuba have been singularly free from epidemic and infectious diseases. When Cuba is free from such diseases, the chances of an epidemic in our Southern cities are greatly reduced.

And so clause 5 of the amendment, while passed for the benefit of Cuba, is also for the benefit of the United States. Cuba obligates itself to extend the plans already devised and others that may be mutually agreed upon for the sanitation of the island.

All this requires money, and that money can only be obtained at the custom-houses on imports, and imports only come in when exports go out at a profit. So it is that the Platt amendment, which is in the main intended for the welfare of the island of Cuba, is also for the benefit of the people of the United States, and was so understood at the time of its adoption. As the Secretary of War so clearly states, "the peace of Cuba is necessary to the peace of the United States, the health of Cuba is necessary to the health of the United States, the independence of Cuba is necessary to the safety of the United States, and the same consideration which led to the war with Spain now requires that a commercial arrangement be made under which Cuba can live."

A stable government, with revenues sufficient to pay its expenses, is absolutely necessary for the good of Cuba, and such a government can not be organized or maintained unless it is based on the prosperity of the people of the island. Her principal product is sugar, which she now sells in our market below the cost of production. We can relieve the situation and insure the maintenance of a stable government in Cuba if we will permit the sale of that product in our market at a profit."

When the Platt amendment was submitted to the Cuban constitutional convention, there was much opposition to its adoption. It was finally agreed to by the convention with an appendix which General Wood submitted to the Secretary of War. This appendix provided that at the time the Platt amendment was agreed to by Cuba, a treaty of commerce based on reciprocity between the natural and manufactured products of both countries should be agreed to. On May 28, 1901, the Secretary of War wrote to General Wood in regard to this appendix, which was called by the Cubans an "explanation," saying:

The explanation further emasculates the clause by tacking to it a provision for a reciprocity treaty at the same time; that is, it makes the sale or lease of coaling stations dependent upon a reciprocity treaty satisfactory to Cuba.

The whole subject will be laid before the President as soon as possible after his arrival here on Thursday, when I will communicate with you further.

On the same day General Wood cabled to the Secretary of War that the Platt amendment and appendix had been passed by the constitutional convention that day.

On May 31, 1901, the Secretary of War wrote to General Wood in regard to the "explanation," saying:

The explanation further adds a provision for the celebration, at the same time, of a reciprocity treaty between Cuba and the United States, so that the sale or lease of coaling stations, instead of being ordained by the convention, is left to the uncontrolled will of the government of Cuba under an authority not to be exercised unless it obtains at the same time a satisfactory reciprocity treaty, which, however desirable it may be, is not even referred to in the Platt amendment. The effect of all this is that the naval-station clause of the act of Congress is entirely destroyed.

The Secretary also states in his letter that the Platt amendment, being a law of the United States, the President is bound to execute it, and to execute it as it is. He can not change or modify, add to, or subtract from it. He stated that the executive action called for by the statute is the withdrawal of the army from Cuba, and the statute only authorizes such action when the statute is incorporated into the constitution of Cuba.

In order that a definite understanding might be had with the President and Secretary of War, a commission from the Cuban convention came to Washington. These commissioners had interviews with the President and with the Secretary of War. La Patria, a newspaper published in Habana, under date of May 25,

1901, contains the report made by the chairman of the commission of the interview with the Secretary of War:

The chairman of the commission spoke of the steps taken to obtain a formal promise from the Executive for the purpose of securing favorable legislation for Cuban products, and the efforts made to learn the state of American opinion on the subject. The Secretary (of War) stated that while only speaking for himself and on behalf of the President, he could assure the commission that if the Cuban government were once established there would immediately be appointed a commission to take up the question and propose a commercial treaty between the two countries; that the President would immediately appoint a representative for the purpose of conferring with a Cuban representative as soon as possible with reference to the treaty, which should be based on mutual advantages.

This interview was had on April 24, 1901.

To show the Cuban understanding of what the assurances were I quote from the statement of Miguel Mendoza, found on page 412 of the recent hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means:

Mr. LONG. You state that you were given certain assurances by the President?

Mr. MENDOZA. By President McKinley.

Mr. LONG. By President McKinley, when you accepted the Platt amendment?

Mr. MENDOZA. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. Will you state how and in what manner those assurances were given?

Mr. MENDOZA. Well, when the Platt amendment was made they did not want to accept it in Cuba, and commissioners were sent here to say that they would be willing to accept it if some economic concessions were made to Cuba. Then, as Congress was not in session, they were assured that that could not be done at once, but that they should accept the amendment as it had been framed; and the President said that while, of course, he could not promise anything (because that does not depend upon the President) he would use his influence, as I have said, in the direction of our receiving fair treatment and getting some concessions.

Mr. LONG. That was President McKinley?

Mr. MENDOZA. President McKinley; yes, sir; and President Roosevelt has followed President McKinley's policy in that respect, because he supports us in his message.

On June 13, 1901, General Wood cabled the Secretary of War that the Platt amendment had been accepted by the constitutional convention, exactly as written, without any change or modification whatever, by a vote of 16 in favor to 11 against.

WHY CUBA WANTS "McKINLEY RECIPROCITY."

It is necessary only to refer to recent history to understand why the people of Cuba are so anxious for reciprocity with the United States. They had it once under the McKinley law, and it was so popular in Cuba that they call it to this day "McKinley reciprocity." The repeal of the McKinley law by Congress in 1894 was no less disastrous to Cuba than it was to the United States. With the repeal of that law, reciprocity with the United States came to an end.

Mr. Robert P. Porter, special commissioner of the United States, in 1898 made a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, using the following language:

Several of the witnesses examined in Havana and other cities of Cuba earnestly requested that the rates of duty of the McKinley reciprocity treaty be reenacted on articles coming from the United States. In support of this they urged the fact that the Spanish-Cuban war was to a large extent a commercial war; that the repeal of the McKinley reciprocity treaty was a severe blow to the Cuban producer, and brought to an end a period of considerable industrial prosperity in the island of Cuba.

The figures of importations into Cuba during the years in which reciprocity was in force bear evidence of this. The first year of the reciprocity treaty the amount of imports from the United States into Cuba was $11,000,000; the second year, $17,000,000; and the last year it amounted to $23,000,000. We were able, under this treaty, to have the Cuban market entirely to ourselves. The English, French, and Germans were left out altogether. These figures do not fully indicate the benefits arising from the reciprocity treaty. The only attainable figures are from Spanish sources, and therefore, very much allowance must be made for undervaluation, false classification, and smuggling. In view of this there are some competent authorities who contend that if the above figures were all multiplied by two it would give a more accurate idea of the value of the commodities sent from the United States to Cuba during this prosperous period.

The effect of what the Cubans call the McKinley reciprocity treaty was almost magical, and many witnesses referred to that period not only as the most prosperous in recent years in Cuba, but as giving them opportunity for improving their estates and making purchases otherwise impossible.

To what extent the repeal of this reciprocity treaty may have been responsible for the war it is impossible to say, nor is such a discussion within the province of this report, dealing, as it does, with the present industrial condition of the island.

Nevertheless, there may be found in all the ports of the island of Cuba visited by your Commissioner a very strong feeling that the closer the ties of reciprocal trade are between the United States and Cuba, the better for that island.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS CAUSED WAR IN 1895.

Mr. Porter then quotes the following from a memorandum sent by the Cuban planters to the Spanish Cortes in 1895:

The uneasiness and discontent prevailing in Cuba proceeded mainly, if not exclusively, from economical causes. That modern history teaches and logic confirms the truth that as long as the grave economical questions which interest and convulse Cuba are not settled no moral peace and no confidence in the future are to be expected.

The report then continues:

These words may be taken in conjunction with the testimony of many other witnesses, who have openly insisted that the Cuban war was a commercial war, culminating in consequence of the repeal of the McKinley reciprocity treaty.

To show that Spain recognized that the Cuban insurrection had its origin in economic conditions, and that reciprocity with the United States would relieve the situation, bring prosperity to Cuba, and help to end the war, is shown by the proceedings preceding the granting of autonomy to Cuba. Sagasta in submitting the new constitution to the Queen Regent on November 25, 1897, said in regard to the conditions in Cuba:

Complaints arose, not from the existence of discriminating duties, but from the fact that these duties were too high, and that this prevented the Antilles from securing the markets which they needed for their rich and abundant productions and from the lack of reciprocity.

In the constitution given to Cuba on the above date, it was provided that treaties of commerce affecting the Island of Cuba should be conducted by Spain, but assisted by special delegates duly authorized by Cuba. This was the first time Cuba ever was permitted to participate in the negotiation of treaties of commerce. Spain immediately endeavored to negotiate such a treaty with the United States. On March 17, 1898, within a month before our war with Spain began, the Spanish minister in Washington addressed a note to the Secretary of State advising him of his appointment, together with representatives from the insular government of Cuba, to conduct negotiations for a treaty of reciprocity between the United States and Cuba. If economical causes brought on the insurrection against Spain, may not similar conditions in the island produce like results in the future?

Can the Cubans be censured for wishing to have an understanding with the United States in regard to reciprocity before they accepted the Platt amendment? The island had had reciprocity under the McKinley law, and the people knew what it meant to them. The people of this country, after the repeal of the McKinley law and their experience under a different policy, demanded its reenactment, and Congress gave them the Dingley law in its place. The people of Cuba, after their experience under McKinley reciprocity and its repeal, wanted it renewed, and have asked the United States for its reenactment. Let us, in the interest of Cuba and also for the benefit of the people of this country, give them the pending Payne bill.

OUR OBLIGATIONS TO CUBA.

As President Roosevelt said in his message to Congress, there are weighty reasons of morality and national interest why the policy of reciprocity should be held to have a peculiar application to Cuba. Cuba has consented that the United States may intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for the discharge of the obligations imposed by the treaty of Paris. It is apparent to anyone that to carry out the obligations assumed by Cuba that it is necessary that the people of the island shall be prosperous and that the government shall be successful.

There is no market but ours for Cuban sugar. Practically her entire crop will come here for sale in the future, as in the past, to be disposed of either at a profit or a loss. By tariff regulations and restrictions, practically every European country has shut out Cuban sugar. It will come here to be disposed of, and it is the chief source of revenue for the Cuban people. If this product is disposed of at less than the cost of production it will prevent the people of Cuba from purchasing from other countries anything except the bare necessities of life. If the purchasing power of Cuba is reduced to a low level her revenues will decline and her government will be unable to carry out and perform the obligations imposed by the Platt amendment.

It is apparent to anyone that the obligations can only be discharged by a solvent government, established over a free people who are contented and prosperous. If sugar is the principal product on which the people of Cuba depend and that product can not be disposed of except at a loss, it means general destitution to the whole island. Three-fourths of the people of Cuba are directly or indirectly interested in the success of the sugar industry. When it is prosperous the island is contented and happy, and when failure comes they are all sad and despondent. We are not obliged nor are we under any obligations to feed and clothe the people of Cuba. It is not a question of charity, and we should not look upon it in that way.

INDEPENDENCE VALUELESS WITHOUT PROSPERITY.

But this nation, witnessing the condition of the island during its struggle against Spain, insisted that the cruel war should stop and that the people of Cuba should have a right to establish a government of their own. That government is soon to be established. The military government that we have maintained in the island ever since the end of the Spanish war is shortly to be succeeded by a government of their own selection. But a free government, even though selected by the voice of the people, can not be successful if the people themselves are not prosperous. We certainly can not claim that our mission is ended if when we withdraw our Army from Cuba and leave the island to its own people and to the government they have selected business conditions in the island are similar to what they were before we intervened.

President McKinley, in his message to Congress, December 5, 1898, said:

As soon as we are in possession of Cuba and have pacified the island it will be necessary to give aid and direction to its people to form a government for themselves. This should be undertaken at the earliest moment consistent with safety and assured success. It is important that our relations with this people shall be of the most friendly character and our commercial relations close and reciprocal.

President McKinley also said in his annual message of December 5, 1899:

This nation has assumed before the world a grave responsibility for the future good government of Cuba. We have accepted a trust the fulfillment of which calls for the sternest integrity of purpose and the exercise of the highest wisdom. The new Cuba yet to arise from the ashes of the past must needs be bound to us by ties of singular intimacy and strength if its enduring welfare is to be assured. Whether those ties shall be organic or conventional, the destinies of Cuba are in some rightful form and manner irrevocably linked with our own, but how or how far is for the future to determine in the ripeness of events. Whatever be the outcome, we must see to it that free Cuba is a reality, not a name, a perfect entity, not a hasty experiment bearing within itself the elements of failure. Our mission, to accomplish which we took up the waver of battle, is not to be fulfilled by turning adrift any loosely-framed commonwealth to face the vicissitudes which too often attend weaker States whose natural wealth and abundant resources are offset by the incongruities of their political organization and the recurring occasions for internal rivalries to sap their strength and dissipate their energies. The greatest blessing which can come to Cuba is the restoration of her agricultural and industrial prosperity, which will give employment to idle men and reestablish the pursuits of peace. This is her chief and immediate need.

These words were used over two years ago, and later the Platt amendment put into statutory form our present relations with Cuba. There must be a stable government in Cuba, capable of performing its international obligations, and such government can not exist or be maintained except by ample revenues through the ordinary channels of taxation, and the revenues can not be obtained unless the people of the island can dispose of their products at a reasonable profit.

The Secretary of War states the whole proposition in his last report as follows:

Cuba has acquiesced in our right to say that she shall not put herself in the hands of any other power, whatever her necessities, and in our right to insist upon the maintenance of free and orderly government throughout her limits, however impoverished and desperate may be her people. Correlative to this right is a duty of the highest obligation to treat her not as an enemy, not at arm's length as an aggressive commercial rival, but with a generosity which toward her will be but justice; to shape our laws so that they shall contribute to her welfare as well as our own. * * * Aside from the moral obligation to which we committed ourselves when we drove Spain out of Cuba, and aside from the ordinary considerations of commercial advantage involved in a reciprocity treaty, there are the weightiest reasons of American public policy pointing in the same direction; for the peace of Cuba is necessary to the peace of the United States; the health of Cuba is necessary to the health of the United States; the independence of Cuba is necessary to the safety of the United States. The same considerations which led to the war with Spain now require that a commercial arrangement be made under which Cuba can live.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY NOT YET ENDED.

It is contended by the opponents of this bill that our responsibility for the welfare of Cuba ended with the war with Spain; that there is no obligation resting on us to provide for the future commercial prosperity of the Cuban people. To those who believe that our work in Cuba is ended I commend a careful reading of the following editorial in the Havana Post of January 19, 1902:

But the primary cause which led to war, to Cuban independence, and to intervention by the United States is not removed. Good government has ameliorated the conditions, but it can not change them. The best government can not long be maintained here, if the present economic conditions shall continue. There would have been no uprising in 1894 if Cuba had not been dependent then, as she is now, upon the production of sugar; and economically her people are no better off to-day than they were then.

To leave her now, as it is proposed, without relief, but still the victim of the world's sugar tariffs and crushed by the appalling misfortunes which the last ten years have heaped upon her, would be to cast to the winds every shred of the admirable fabric of free government which the Americans have created. American intervention can not stop at this point. Good sense, business foresight, fair play and common honesty will all unite to prevent it. It is not the practice of the United States to let good work go backward, to miss opportunities for business advancement, to ignore her obligations, or to inflict needless suffering upon any people. And she would be guilty of all these if she withdrew from Cuba at this time without securing to the island industrial as well as political freedom.

That it is our duty to complete the work undertaken in Cuba is recognized by every patriotic American. We can discharge this obligation and still do no harm to any American industry. Special interests have endeavored to prevent action and tried to alarm Congress by the cry that their particular industries will be ruined if reciprocity with Cuba is adopted. The facts do not warrant this assumption, and if this Congress does its duty, as did the Congress that passed the resolution of intervention, it will provide before this session ends for reciprocity with Cuba, which will bring happiness and contentment to the people of that island, further promote the prosperity of the people of the United States, and honorably finish the work undertaken when the war with Spain began. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LANDIS having taken the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. CROOK, one of his secretaries.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, it is needless for me to say that I feel deeply upon the question involved in the bill pending before this House. I can not concur in the opinion of the proponents of this measure, that it is for the best interest of the Government, or that its benefits will accrue to the poor people of Cuba. To my mind there is something in this proposition which does not appear upon its face. Although I have no doubt that our opponents are absolutely honest in their belief, yet, in view of the conduct of the American Sugar Refining Company in the past year, I can not but conclude that this measure is more in the interest of that company, commonly called the sugar trust, than of our own Government or the people of Cuba. In my judgment it is a continuation of the fight which the American Sugar Refining Company has been making to exterminate the beet-sugar industry of America.

The company has not used corrupt methods, but has applied far more effective weapons. It started a literary bureau, which disseminated throughout the United States articles that appealed for such legislation. Many newspapers which in some manner are under the influence of its members reiterated and approved the same. Commercial organizations which contained men who were interested in the company indorsed and resolved in favor of the same.

It started upon the proposition that a reduction of duty on Cuban sugar would reduce the price of sugar in the United States, and therefore would be in the interest of the consumer; that as the consumers constituted the entire population of the country, great benefits would accrue to the poor and laboring classes. Many disinterested newspapers, believing this plausible argument, advocated the proposition. Many of the people, thinking the statement true, approved the measure.

But, Mr. Chairman, the parties interested have all admitted before the Ways and Means Committee that such claim is not true; that the consumer will not get any benefit of the proposed 20 per cent reduction of duty on Cuban sugar, but the Cuban planter, or the purchaser thereof, will receive the advantage.

This literary bureau of the sugar-refining company next took the position that the people of Cuba were in distress and many of them at the point of starvation, which was reiterated by many papers of the country. Even the New York Herald, on February 9, 1902, began an editorial as follows:

Anarchy or annexation! One or the other is bound to result from further delay in granting relief to Cuba. While Congress potters and procrastinates the Cuban people starve.

This company knew that such an appeal would strike a responsive chord in the hearts not only of the members of Congress, but of the entire American people. It is no wonder that many of our best citizens regarded this as a most humane and meritorious measure.

But, sir, when the evidence was taken by the committee these claims were proven to be absolutely false. Even the witnesses appearing in behalf of the American Sugar Refining Company admitted that the price of labor in Cuba had risen 75 per cent since the Spanish-American war, and that everyone who wanted to work could find employment.

WAR ON BEET-SUGAR FACTORIES BY SUGAR TRUST.

These claims and positions indicate to me, perhaps more than to many other members of this House, that this is a trust measure, a movement in the attempt of the American Sugar Refining Company to crush out of existence the beet-sugar industry of this country, so that a complete monopoly of the sugars refined in the United States may be concentrated in its hands. Why does it so impress me? Because, Mr. Chairman, last fall this same company made a war—a war to the knife—against the beet-sugar industry of my State. It was then predicted that if it failed the next movement would be to procure legislation through Congress that would strengthen its own position and demonstrate to capital that conditions as to the beet-sugar industry are so unstable as to make it unsafe for further investments.

Three years ago there was not a pound of sugar raised in the State of Colorado. Last year we produced 20,000,000 pounds. Four factories are now producing sugar. Three sugar-beet factories are now in course of construction in the Congressional district I represent, ranging in cost from $500,000 to $1,000,000 each. Companies have the plans drawn and the capital raised to erect four more factories, but are waiting to see the result of this Congressional action, and whether the trust will permit them to live.

The beneficial effects to the farmers residing in the vicinity of these factories are marvelous. This is the one industry that promises to give some fair remuneration to the farmer of the West for his toil and labor. He can now hope to acquire a competence for old age. A large part of the value of the total produce goes to him for the beets he raises, and hence remains in his community.

In view of this development it was but natural that the people of the State of Colorado should take deep interest in and become aroused over the war of The American Sugar Refining Company against this young and promising industry.

Colorado having last year produced more sugar than she could consume was compelled to find a market beyond her borders. That market was naturally in the Missouri River Valley. The agents of this industry went to the cities of that valley and negotiated sales for their product. They had to guarantee that sugar would not on the open market fall below the then selling price, which in Kansas City was $5.23 per hundred pounds. The American Sugar Refining Company, thinking it could compel great losses to the Colorado factories upon those contracts, and thereby make the production of sugar by them unprofitable, ordered sales by the Kansas City agents, not at fair competitive prices, but at absolutely ruinous prices both to itself and the Colorado producers. That company ordered a cut in sugar to $3.50 a hundred pounds, such a cut, I believe, as was never before made. This reduction, however, was only at the Missouri River cities where Colorado sugar had been sold. The price remained $5.03 per hundred in New York, and still higher in Chicago, St. Louis, and the other parts of the country. The cut was made for the very purpose of ruining the beet-sugar industry of our State.

Mr. Chairman, I will now read a few extracts from papers, showing the purpose and intensity of that war of extermination. The following is from the Chicago Tribune of October 4, 1901:

DECLARES WAR ON BEET-SUGAR REFINERS.

War to the knife with the Colorado beet-sugar refiners was declared to-day by the American Sugar Refining Company.

The American Company's price at Kansas City has been 5.23 cents a pound. To-day it was reduced to 3½ cents a pound. The same cut applies to Missouri River points generally, only applying, however, to sections of the country in which beet sugar is in competition with cane sugar. The price made is below the cost of raw sugar, which, of course, means that the company will sustain a loss on its present sales in that section of the country. It is said that the reduction means that most of the beet-sugar factories will be compelled to market their product at a loss if they live up to the contracts they have recently made.

No change was made in American Sugar Refining Company's prices for Eastern markets to-day, and a difference of 1.10 cents a pound held between the price of the raw and the manufactured article. The New York price for raw sugar was quoted at 3½ cents a pound for centrifugal.

Mr. Chairman, it must be borne in mind that this ruinous competition was made by a company with millions at its command against individual refineries and factories which had just started and were in most instances heavily mortgaged. The next extract is from the Omaha Bee of October 10, 1901, which is as follows:

THE WAR ON BEET SUGAR.

The sugar trust is prosecuting its war on the beet-sugar industry with a vigor which plainly denotes a determination to destroy that industry if possible. The reduction in the price of granulated sugar for Missouri River points ordered by the trust last week was probably but the beginning of the war and is likely to be followed by further action on the part of the trust and its Western ally looking to the breaking down of the beet-sugar interest.

The trust may be in position to carry on the war much longer than the beet-sugar interest apparently believes, and there is no doubt the trust is prepared to make a very considerable sacrifice in order to break down the beet-sugar industry, which stands in the way of its scheme to secure the free admission of raw Cuban sugar. That is the inspiration of its present action, and it can be confidently predicted that it will continue the war until the question of our treatment of Cuban sugar shall have been determined.

The Springfield Republican remarks that the sugar war "is spreading out to envelop Congress and make of Cuba—its annexation or its admission to reciprocity with the United States—the ground of a most bitter industrial and political struggle. The sugar trust and the cane interest will stand for reciprocity or free trade with Cuba, and the beet-sugar association will fight this movement to the utmost limit of its resources."

There can be no mistaking the motive of the war on the beet-sugar industry. The trust has declared itself in favor of admitting Cuban raw sugar free and retaining the duty on refined. Under such a policy the domestic-sugar industry would be destroyed and the trust would secure complete and absolute control of the American market. If it can now seriously cripple the beet-sugar industry and discourage its further development it may achieve its object.

It will be observed that the prediction was then made that the sugar trust would continue the war by attempting to secure Congressional legislation which would strengthen its position and injure that of its opponents; that the sugar war would envelop Congress and make the very question before this House now "the ground of a most bitter industrial and political struggle." Is not the prediction almost prophecy?

The next extract is from the Boston Transcript of October 12, 1901, which is as follows:

THE WAR ON BEET SUGAR—TRUST MAY JOIN WITH THE CUBAN INTERESTS.

The action of the American Sugar Refining Company in making a radical reduction in the price of granulated sugar in the Missouri Valley may be regarded as a skirmish preliminary to the great battle between the cane and beet interests, of which the attitude of the United States toward Cuba is the objective point.

This action of the "trust" and such an interview are perhaps more significant than anything else in showing that the "trust" will doubtless make common cause with the Cuban sugar raisers in their warfare against the claims of the beet interests of the West. This gives a strong combination of commercial forces on one side against what is notably, especially in its political ramifications, a strong alliance on the other. Twenty-six States are said to be raising sugar beets, and 52 Senators are claimed as necessarily responsive to the beet interest.

Several years ago the American Sugar Refining Company could not be brought to see that there was any danger in beet-sugar competition. To-day its managers are fully alive to it, as their recent attack shows. That this was a wise move for them to make may be very much doubted. Popular sympathies are always against the "trust," and wherever one seems to be crushing out a local industry by temporarily lowering prices, strong local resentment is liable to result. It is unfortunate, therefore, to ally the cane-sugar cause with the "trust," even though it, as the great user of cane sugar, is naturally interested.

Here again we find the prediction made that the American Sugar

Refining Company will seek by Congressional action to better its condition in its effort to destroy the beet-sugar industry of America. Although these papers have no interest in these industries, yet they all declare the war is on and means ruin and destruction.

Mr. Chairman, this war upon the beet-sugar industry of Colorado was made in no other part of the United States. It was not waged against the Michigan sugar companies because the sugar trust thought it had more numerous and wealthy factories there with which to deal, but in Colorado, with but four factories, the trust believed it could strangle them in their infancy.

It goes without saying that when a war of this kind is waged the people of such State become aroused upon the subject and as one man condemn such aggression, and so it was in Colorado. Every paper in the State condemned this assault upon our industries. It was advocated by the press that the same treatment our forefathers gave in the colonial days to the products sent from England be given to the sugar trust; that the people should combine and agree not to use any sugar of the trust, no matter at what price it was offered for sale. The grocery stores of the State began to sign agreements not to purchase a single pound of sugar from the American Sugar Refining Company irrespective of tempting rates and terms, and had the cut in prices continued, I have no doubt the agreement would have been universally signed and rigidly enforced.

There is no one, Mr. Chairman, within the confines of my State, who indorses this bill. There is not a Democrat or a Republican there who approves this measure. This sentiment is universal, not only in the agricultural parts, but in the cities, the oil sections, and mining districts as well.

POLICY OF SUGAR TRUST AS TO COMPETITORS.

Mr. Chairman, I now want to call attention to the systematic action which the American Sugar Refining Company has always pursued with respect to its rivals; how it has time and again pursued its exterminating policy with success, until to-day it controls 90 per cent of the refined sugar of the United States; how it is now attempting to use the United States Congress in its battle against a home industry.

I read from the statement of Mr. F. R. Hathaway in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means on this measure, at page 225, relative to the testimony of Mr. Havemeyer, president of the American Sugar Refining Company, before the Industrial Commission:

The relief of Cuba is but an incident in the larger policy of the sugar trust to crush all competitors. The greatest competitor this organization has to fear is the beet-sugar industry of the North and West, which is developing with such rapidity as to astound the Eastern refiners. * * *

What is the attitude of the sugar trust toward all competitors? On page 108 of the Report of the Industrial Commission on Trusts and Industrial Combinations, Mr. Havemeyer's testimony reads as follows:

Q. If you can make it unprofitable to them (other refiners) they will stop their sales, and in the long run the expectation is that the profit will be larger to your stockholders?

A. That would be the natural inference. Of course, it goes without saying, if we protect our own meetings, it can only be done under the condition of things that makes it unprofitable for our competitors, the real motive being the protection of our own business, and the result being an absence of profit to them.

"Again, from Mr. Havemeyer's testimony on page 120:

Q. Now, I also understood you to imply at least that it is the policy of the American Sugar Refining Company to crush out all competition if possible?

A. But that is not so; there is no such testimony. I understand it has been put in that form by one of the gentlemen, but it is not the fact. What I said was that it was the policy of the American Company to maintain and protect its trade, and if it resulted in crushing a competitor it is no concern of the American Company. If he gets in the press, that is his affair, not ours.

Q. And if anyone interferes with the business, profits, or competition of the American Sugar Refining Company, it is its policy to prevent it if possible?

A. By lowering profits to defy it.

Q. And if it results in crushing him out—

A. (Interrupting.) That is his affair.

Q. Not the affair of the American Sugar Refining Company?

A. No.

"Again, from Mr. Havemeyer's testimony, page 125:

Q. When you sell in this country, you control the price?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it (the trust) was organized, as I understand it, with a view of controlling the price and output to the people of this country?

A. That was one of the objects of consideration.

Q. And you have succeeded in doing it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was the principal object in organizing the American Sugar Refining Company?

A. It may be said that was the principal object.

"This testimony was read to Mr. Havemeyer as having been given by him before the Lexow committee.

"On page 60 the Industrial Commission states: 'Mr. Havemeyer's testimony before the Lexow committee in 1896 was read to him and he stated that he stood by every word of it.' * * *

"From the time of its organization down to the present the path of the American Sugar Refining Company has been strewn with the wrecks of its competitors. Sometimes these have been crushed and then bought up; sometimes they have been crushed and allowed to remain where they were ruined. (See p. 45.) The same man who has guided the policy of the American Sugar Refining Company from its inception to the present still retains control. His power is as absolute as ever. His policy is plainly declared. The beet-sugar industry of the United States, his only rival, can expect no mercy at his hands. If he has the power he will crush it and coolly state, as he replied to the Industrial Commission, that such a result is not his affair.

"If the American Sugar Refining Company can crush out its competitors, will it then be able to control the sugar business of this country?

"On page 107 Mr. Havemeyer's testimony reads as follows:

Q. What proportion does your output form of the total output of the country now?

A. I have never been able to get at those figures, but I should say about 90 per cent.

Q. You think about 90 per cent of America?

A. That is not of the capacity, but of the output. The fact is that these refineries are not working full.

Q. Does the American Sugar Refining Company itself have a capacity enough to supply the total demand if it were not for the opposition? Your company could easily supply the total demand at the present capacity?

A. The demand and 20 per cent in excess.

"On page 60 the Industrial Commission quotes from Mr. Havemeyer's testimony before the Lexow committee as follows:

It goes without saying that a man who produces 80 per cent of an article can control the price by not producing.

This evidence shows that in 1899 Mr. Havemeyer was not only able to supply the entire consumption of sugar in the United States from refineries owned by him, but without increasing their capacity could supply 20 per cent more than the people of the United States could use.

If the sugar trust secures the absolute control of the American market, what will be its policy toward the consumer?

"On page 112 Mr. Havemeyer states:

We maintain that when we reduced the cost we were entitled to the profit, and that it was none of the public's business.

"On page 117 Mr. Havemeyer's testimony reads as follows:

Q. I say he (the consumer) may be benefited temporarily for six months or a year, but if, after the crushing out has taken place, you then, as you said in your testimony, resume a margin of profit which you consider is the right thing, and that is the only thing you were governed by, I ask you then whether the consumer will be materially benefited or not?

A. Is he not benefited to the extent of the reduction of the prices during the fight?

Q. He is; but if he has to pay double or three times the price after the fight is ended I fail to see where he is benefited.

A. He is not if he has to pay that.

Q. I understood you to say when the war was ended you evened up?

A. Yes.

Q. The price you put on was for the benefit of the stockholder?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you think it is fair that the customer should pay a dividend to your company on brands, good will, etc.?

A. I think it is fair to get out of the customer all you can consistent with the business proposition.

Q. You state that as an ethical proposition before this Commission, and you have to stand on that ethical position for fair play. Now, I want to know if you think—you stated that the consumer received the benefits of this consolidation of industry—it a fair ethical position, independent of the business view you put on it, that the consumer should pay dividends on this $25,000,000 of overcapitalization?

A. I do not care 2 cents for your ethics. I do not know enough of them to apply them. * * *

"The Industrial Commission, on page 46, sums up the effect of Mr. Havemeyer's position on prices as follows:

On the whole, the chart seems to make it perfectly evident that the sugar combination has raised the price of refined sugar beyond the rates in vogue during the period of active competition before the formation of the sugar trust and the two competitive periods during its existence.

CAPITALIZATION.

The report of the Industrial Commission, page 123, shows that the original capital stock of the 15 or 16 companies that were merged into the sugar trust in 1887 was $5,500,000. When the new company was organized it was capitalized at $50,000,000, half of which was preferred and half common stock. (See page 124.)

During the years 1890 and 1891 the active competition against the American Sugar Refining Company was so keen that an additional issue of stock, amounting to $25,000,000, was made, in order to buy up all the other sugar refineries. (See page 43.) The capital stock of $75,000,000 remained until 1901, when, according to newspaper statements, the stock was increased to $90,000,000. Now, new refineries have, however, been erected since the last issue of stock. The purpose for which this stock was issued is not plain, but in many quarters it is supposed that the major part of the new $15,000,000 was to be used in Cuban investments. We are, however, unable to substantiate this rumor.

On page 111 Mr. Havemeyer states that his refineries could be rebuilt new at a cost of from $50,000,000 to $50,000,000.

Mr. Post, on pages 151 and 152, estimates that the cost of rebuilding the American Sugar Refining plants new would cost even less.

Upon the testimony of Mr. Havemeyer we base our conclusion that there is from $50,000,000 to $80,000,000 water in its present capitalization.

The Industrial Commission finds, page 43, that the dividends on the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company since 1891, for each year, have been 7 per cent on preferred stock and average 12 per cent on common stock. The dividends on common stock range from 4 per cent, the year the company was formed, to 21 per cent in 1893. (See page 43.)

Mr. Chairman, this evidence shows that the American Sugar Refining Company from the time of its incorporation to the present has pursued an unrelenting war of subjugation or extermination against every company that attempted to enter into the business of refining sugar. Sir, not content with sharing the markets with other companies, which were equally entitled to the same; not satisfied with competition within the margin of profit, the life of trade, but using the full power of its $90,000,000 of capital, it has, at enormous expense, inflicted such losses upon rival enterprises as produced the only alternative of ruin or surrender. There is no justification for such rule or ruin policy. Almost as well might we justify one body of men crippling the limbs of their rivals so as effectually to prevent competition in labor.

* The consolidation of these factories means no good to the consumer of sugar. The evidence shows a profit as high as 21½ per cent on common stock in one year upon a capital of $50,000,000, when the aggregate capital of the refineries consolidated amounted only to $6,500,000, or more than 100 per cent in one year. Although the selling quotation of sugar is reduced during the fight, yet after it is over the loss is made good by increased prices.

The fact that the present price of the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company is $115,000,000, when their plants could be duplicated for $35,000,000, shows what large profits it makes in refining sugar.

Mr. Chairman, that is the kind of competition the beet-sugar industry is compelled to fight for existence. The ruinous cut on sugar in the Kansas City market was simply carrying out the general policy of the company. Is it any wonder that having failed in their Missouri River Valley war it should bend all the energies of its literary bureau and the newspapers subject to its influence toward forcing through Congress a measure that will add millions to its treasury, strengthen its attitude in this contest, and render unstable and weak the position of its opponents?

These are the reasons why I believe this is more of a trust measure than legislation for the people.

ARE WE UNDER A MORAL OBLIGATION TO CUBA?

Mr. Chairman, they tell us that the United States is under a moral obligation to Cuba to relieve her distress. By what facts or principle of the moral law do they justify such an obligation? It is said the Platt amendment imposes such a duty, but when we examine the provisions of that legislation we fail to find any stipulation or inference that will justify such a contention.

The first provision of that law is that Cuba shall not make any treaty impairing its own independence; the second is that she shall not contract any debt greater than her revenues in time can liquidate; the third is that we can intervene to preserve Cuban independence and government; the fourth validates the acts of our Government in Cuba during our occupation; the fifth is that Cuba shall extend the work of sanitation; the sixth is that the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the boundaries of Cuba; the seventh provides that Cuba shall sell or lease to us land for coaling or naval stations; the eighth is that Cuba shall embody these provisions in her constitution.

Where is there an inference of obligation in any of these provisions? We have not deprived Cuba of any market she had prior to our intervention. We do not restrict Cuba in the slightest in the formation of any commercial treaty she may deem it expedient to make.

But, sir, the obligation is all on the other side. What have we done for these people? We have intervened at their instance and request to relieve them from the tyranny and oppression of Spain. We have given to them just what they wanted, liberty and freedom and a government of their own. We have expended in order to give them these blessings more than $250,000,000. But that is not all we have done for them. Spain had contracted a public debt of $300,000,000 which was specified should be payable out of the revenues of that island. By the treaty of Paris we wipe out that obligation on the part of Cuba. Thus we see we have expended out of our own Treasury for the benefit of Cuba $250,000,000, and saved to that government the payment of $300,000,000 of bonds which Spain would have forced her to pay.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Three hundred and thirty million dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the gentleman. I have always heard it referred to as $300,000,000. We have paid for and saved to each man, woman, and child of Cuba nearly $400. We have never been so generous to our own people.

In addition, we voted out of our Treasury $3,000,000 to relieve the distress, suffering, and starvation of the poor of that island. And above all, for the cause of that people, we have sacrificed on the field of battle and by disease many of the bravest and best of the youth of our land. The moral obligation is all on the part of Cuba and not the United States.

REDUCTION OF DUTY ON CUBAN SUGAR WILL NOT BENEFIT THE CONSUMER.

It has been admitted in this debate that the passage of this bill making a reduction of 20 per cent on imports from Cuba will not affect the price of sugar in the United States. And yet I presume there are some who do not see why that is true. The reason is, because there is an international market price for sugar. Hamburg is the great sugar market of the world. The market price at Hamburg determines the price of sugar in every other country.

The New York price is the Hamburg price plus freight and duties. The Cuban price is the New York price less freight, duty, and refining charges. It is impossible for two sugars of the same grade to sell in the New York market at different prices. The Cuban sugar can not pull down the price of the Hamburg sugar, because it is small in quantity compared to the world's supply, and the Hamburg price is determined by the world's demand for and supply of sugar, including that raised in Cuba. As Cuban sugar can not pull down the price of Hamburg sugar, and as sugars of the same grade can not sell in the same market at different prices, the irresistible conclusion is that Cuban sugar in the New York market will be elevated to the price of the Hamburg sugar. If the production of Cuban sugar, together with our domestic sugar, were more than sufficient to supply our demand, so that we would not be compelled to buy any from the Hamburg market, then the admission of Cuban sugar at reduced duty or free would affect the price in New York, and the consumer would derive a benefit from the same. But that is not the case.

Our consumption of sugar this year will be 2,500,000 tons. There will be supplied by—

	Tons.
Cuba, about.....	850,000
Porto Rico, about.....	150,000
Hawaiian Islands, about.....	350,000
United States, about.....	350,000
Total.....	1,700,000
Leaving to be purchased from Hamburg.....	800,000

All of the 800,000 tons from the Hamburg or other market subject to its influence must pay the full tariff rates and hence must sell at the Hamburg price plus freight and duties.

We are familiar with this economic truth when applied to wheat or cotton. The world's market for those commodities is at Liverpool. The price of wheat or cotton at any point in the United States can be ascertained by deducting from the Liverpool price the cost of transportation.

Mr. Havemeyer himself published a statement in the Boston Herald of January 21, 1902, in which he used the following language:

The American Sugar Refining Company's attitude has been merely to place before the public the operation of the tariff laws on sugar, in the hope that Congress would remove the entire duty on raw sugar. Any partial removal in favor of any country would accrue entirely to that country and not to the consumers of sugar in the United States.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in his report on this bill made the following statement:

All the experts who were called before the committee admit that the price of sugar will not be less to the consumer on account of the 20 per cent reduction proposed.

All the minority reports upon this bill also admit the same thing. Therefore it seems to me conclusive that the consumer in the United States will not get any benefit from a reduction of the duty on Cuban sugar authorized by this bill.

It is asked by some, If that is true why do those who represent States in which sugar is produced object to the enactment of this legislation? The answer is, because the passage of this bill will terrorize capitalists seeking investment in the beet-sugar industries—make them believe that conditions as to beet sugar are unstable and therefore unsafe for investment.

Because it will stimulate the production of sugar in Cuba, which might, if the provisions of this bill were extended some years after January 1, 1904—the date of its expiration—cause Cuba to supply our entire market to the extinction of our own product. The testimony shows that Cuban lands when fully developed are capable of producing 4,000,000 tons of sugar.

Because it will amount to a donation out of the United States Treasury of a large sum of money.

A GIFT OF FROM $7,000,000 TO $8,000,000.

The amount lost to the revenues of this Government by reason of the passage of this measure will be between seven and eight millions of dollars per annum, or from fourteen to sixteen millions during the time of the operation of this bill. Inasmuch as the sole market for the surplus Cuban sugar is now and always has been the United States, that product is bound to come to this country whether this legislation is enacted or not, hence a reduction in duty on Cuban sugar is a loss of just that much to the revenues of our Government. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in his report says:

The reduction of 20 per cent proposed in this bill means a loss of revenue of between seven and eight million dollars.

The reduction of 40 per cent would make a loss of twice that sum.

The benefit of that reduction therefore is equivalent to a rebate or gift out of the public Treasury.

NO DISTRESS OF THE POOR IN CUBA.

Mr. Chairman, a few months ago it was claimed that the poor of Cuba were in distress at the point of starvation, and that every impulse of humanity should prompt us to vote legislation such as this to relieve them. No people at the point of starvation have ever appealed to the United States in vain, and never will, but the evidence is conclusive that no suffering exists in Cuba.

I want to read the testimony of the witnesses appearing before the Ways and Means Committee in favor of this bill upon this question.

Mr. Edwin F. Atkins, a merchant, sugar planter, and stockholder in the American Sugar Refining Company, at page 18, testified as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. Are they import agents for the Sugar Refining Company or sugar trust?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir. The trust imports its own sugar, where it is imported at all. They have no agent.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are sugar brokers in New York?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have just said, in reply to Mr. METCALF, that your sugar business in Cuba has been profitable. Was it profitable last year?

Mr. ATKINS. It was profitable last year. I do not deny it, sir; and if you will allow me to make a statement here—

The CHAIRMAN. Of course you can make any statement you desire in answer to a question.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not deny I made money in Cuba last year. I do not think that is anything to my discredit. But the average planter in Cuba last year, I am assured by the very best authorities of the island, did not make money out of last year's operations, but barely covered the cost of its production.

Mr. COOPER. What is the difference in the price of wages there now and the price of wages before the war?

Mr. ATKINS. Before the war, during the insurrection, wages were very low indeed. The price of wages at the present time—well, I should think that they had increased 75 per cent, but wages before the war, during the three years of the insurrection, were abnormally low.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I understood you paid $23 for twenty-six days' work.

Mr. ATKINS. That is about the average on my place.

Mr. RUSSELL. And you mentioned other localities and plantations where they paid $1 a day.

Mr. ATKINS. Exactly; and that is $26 for twenty-six days' work.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then you certainly pay less than they do?

Mr. ATKINS. I pay less than they pay, but I pay more than gentlemen from the provinces of Habana and Matanzas.

Mr. RUSSELL. How much more?

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Mendoza says the rate I spoke of is $3 higher than he pays.

Mr. RUSSELL. You are paying what might be considered the average rate?

Mr. ATKINS. I think I am paying the average rate on the island.

Mr. Miguel G. De Mendoza, Cuban commissioner on economic affairs and sugar planter, at page 66 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, testified as follows:

Mr. TAWNEY. Is labor generally employed on the island outside of Habana?

Mr. MENDOZA. Sir?

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the laboring class more generally employed on the island outside of Habana?

Mr. MENDOZA. It is. All the sugar plantations are working by this time. They are all employed. There is plenty of work for the workmen in Cuba to-day.

Mr. TAWNEY. And at good wages?

Mr. MENDOZA. Well, not very good, because the wages in Cuba increase according to the price of sugar. When sugar is low we can not afford to pay high wages.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are paying now for common laborers as high as $30 per month, are they not?

Mr. MENDOZA. In some places in the island, but not in all. In the eastern part of the island, which is less populated, the wages of labor are higher.

Col. T. S. Bliss, United States Army, collector of the port at Habana, at pages 389, 392, and 399 of said hearings, gave evidence as follows:

Mr. METCALF. Is there any distress at the present time in the island of Cuba, Colonel?

Colonel BLISS. Any distress? No, sir.

Mr. METCALF. The people are all employed?

Colonel BLISS. Yes, sir; I should say that there was no distress whatever, from all I have seen.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is there any distress in any industry in the island of Cuba except the sugar industry?

Colonel BLISS. I should say not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand it, the labor in Cuba is at present well employed and at good wages.

Colonel BLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That means that the present production of sugar utilizes all the labor that now exists in Cuba, does it not?

Colonel BLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. You have said that labor there is employed, all over the island. In what does this distress of which you speak consist?

Colonel BLISS. I have not spoken of any distress, except to deny that any existed, so far as I knew. It is a long time since I have seen anyone begging on the streets, or anybody who wanted to work who was not at work at good wages.

The testimony of these men, especially when not contradicted, ought to settle conclusively that the poor in Cuba are not in distress, but are in better condition than they have ever been in the history of the island. In fact there has been such a shortage in labor there that 60,000 laborers were imported to supply the market.

SHOULD WE RELIEVE FOREIGN PLANTERS FROM LOSSES IN SPECULATIVE VENTURES?

But, sir, it is now said that the price of sugar in Cuba is below the cost of production; that her plantations are mortgaged, and her sugar crop pledged to secure debts bearing interest at from 8 to 18 per cent per annum; that she is on the eve of a financial panic, and that we should relieve this condition by the passage of this bill.

Some gentlemen have, in our presence, even made a calculation showing just how much of a reduction we ought to make in order to prevent loss to the Cuban planters and give them a small profit.

This condition is much to be regretted, but it is no fault of ours. This situation is not due to any legislation upon the part of this Government, but is due to the overproduction of sugar in the world, caused largely by the action of the European governments in granting bounties for the raising of beet sugar.

Is there any reason that we should vote revenues out of our own Treasury to relieve such distress in a foreign country, when we have never done it for our own people? Charity should begin at home. When corn was selling at 8, 9, and 10 cents per bushel in Kansas a few years ago, which was below the cost of production, did Congress vote money to make good those losses? Did even a Kansas Representative in this House suggest a measure that squinted at giving these farmers a donation from the Treasury of the United States? When cotton was selling in the South at 4½ cents a pound no Southern Representative made the suggestion that on account of the wealth and generosity of the American people Congress should save the cotton planters from loss upon their crops.

Mr. Chairman, there never was a people that had so much distress inflicted upon them in times of peace as the people of the State of Colorado in 1893. This condition was directly caused by legislation upon the silver question by the American Congress.

A thousand silver mines were shut down by reason of the drop in the price of silver, caused by the legislation of that body. Ten thousand men were thrown out of employment and left the State because the mines could not be operated at a profit. The production of silver being at that time the leading industry of that State, naturally it was the main support of the value of all the real estate of her cities. The drop in the price of silver was followed almost instantaneously by enormous depreciation in the value of her property. Owners of real estate, who had no fear of the little mortgages upon their premises, suddenly found themselves bankrupts.

Although this distress and suffering were inflicted by reason of legislation of this body, yet no one ever suggested that the Treasury of the United States should be opened to reimburse the mine owners who had suffered loss nor the miners who were thrown out of employment by reason of that great calamity. We did not then relieve our own miners who had ventured their all in mining properties. Should we now relieve foreign planters who have met with losses in a speculative venture in sugar lands?

WHO WILL GET THE $7,000,000 OR $8,000,000 OF THE FIRST YEAR?

But, sir, that is not the worst feature of this proposition. Who will get the seven or eight million dollars that is proposed we shall take from the revenues of this Government the first year. The laborer can not get it, because the crop has been harvested, the raw sugar produced, and he has been paid his wages.

Most of the planters can not get any of the amount this year, because by the time this bill passes the Senate and the Cuban legislature meets and enacts the necessary laws in acceptance of this bill almost the entire sugar crop of Cuba will be in the hands of the purchaser.

The testimony at first was that to relieve the planter it was necessary that this legislation should be enacted by March 1, 1902. The testimony shows that there are no sugar refineries in Cuba and that the American Sugar Refining Company is the sole customer of that commodity.

So it seems conclusive that the sugar trust will get at least nine-tenths of the first year's benefit of this legislation.

WHO WILL GET THE BENEFIT OF THE SECOND YEAR'S REDUCTION?

It is said the planters will receive the advantages of this measure next year. Most of the cane grown in Cuba is raised on large plantations which are chiefly owned by Spaniards. Some large plantations are owned by Americans, among whom are stockholders of the American Sugar Refining Company.

Mr. BISHOP. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to how much of this sugar land in Cuba is owned by Spaniards living outside of Cuba and by people living in the United States?

Mr. SHAFROTH. More than two-thirds of the lands, I understand, are owned by the Spaniards and Americans, but as to where they live I do not know. Of such lands the Spaniards own more than twice as much as the Americans.

But I want to show that of the $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 of revenue to be taken from the Treasury next year the American Sugar Refining Company will get the major part.

It is conceded by Mr. Havemeyer that his company is the sole purchaser of Cuban sugar, which is bought at Havana and other points in the island. The sugar is not marketed by the planter at New York, but even if it were he would find only the same customer there.

In the negotiations for sugar, of course the American Sugar

Refining Company will endeavor to buy as cheap as it can and get as much of the benefit of this reduction of duty as possible. The Cuban planter will try to do the same thing. Which is in the better position, which more likely to gain advantage in the negotiations?

The American Sugar Refining Company has a capital of $90,000,000, which is worth to-day on the stock market $115,000,000. The planters, according to the testimony, have mortgages on their plantations upon which they are paying large rates of interest. Which party is in the better position to dictate terms? The agent of the American Sugar Refining Company will go to the planter and say, "I will pay you the same price for sugar as I have been giving." The sugar producer will say, "No; since my former sales a 20 per cent reduction in duty on Cuban sugar has been made by the United States, and I should have the benefit of the same." The agent will respond, "I do not care to buy to-day." The sugar trust has the world's market in which it can buy raw sugar. The Cuban planter has no other market than America in which to sell and no other customer than the American Sugar Refining Company to whom he can sell. Which can hold out the longer? The American Sugar Refining Company, with its millions, can wait. The planter, with interest at ruinous rates accumulating, must sell. A compromise will be effected, but the company will get the greater part of the 20 per cent reduction.

Thus this measure means that under the plea of relieving distress in Cuba nine-tenths of the millions of the revenue donated by this bill for this year and more than half for the next year will go into the pockets of the American Sugar Refining Company. If a greater reduction is made, the greater the benefit the trust will receive. Is not that too much of a bonus to give in order that a small portion may reach some speculative planters in Cuba who may now be in distress? Will not this bonus strengthen the arm of a company, which, by reason of its monopolizing the sugar market, has added sixty millions of watered stock to its capital, and which has used the full force of that capital and will use the full power of this bonus to exterminate the individual beet-sugar factories of the United States?

No surer indication that the larger part of the revenues appropriated in this bill will find their way into the coffers of the American Sugar Refining Company can be found than the effect this bill has had on the stock of that company.

It was on March 18, 1902, that the majority of the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee approved this bill. The increase in the value of the stock of this company by reason thereof is shown in the following:

COMMON STOCK.
$45,000,000, at $116.50 a share in January, 1902.....	$52,425,000.00
Same stock at $133.50 a share March 22.....	60,075,000.00
Net increase.....	7,650,000.00
PREFERRED STOCK.
$45,000,000, at $115 a share in January.....	$51,750,000.00
Same stock at $119.50 a share March 22.....	53,775,000.00
Net increase.....	2,025,000.00

COMMON AND PREFERRED.
Total increase in valuation of both common and preferred stock since first week in January..... $9,675,000.00

The papers of New York City, which are almost all in favor of this measure, indicate the cause of the increase in the value of that stock. The following are some of the views:

Sugar jumped up on the many protests that more than a 20 per cent reduction on raws from Cuba should be granted. Of course, the larger the cut on raw-sugar duties the larger the benefits to the sugar trust. What refiners of cane sugar in New York want is a lower duty on the raw material, so that they can crush out the domestic beet-sugar industry more easily. (New York Press, March 21.)

Sugar refining reacted sharply in the early trading under pool realizing. The stock was stimulated in the later trading on buying orders executed by houses with Washington connections, and reports of a 33 1/3 per cent reduction on Cuban sugar, instead of 20, in the reciprocity treaty were circulated. (New York Herald, March 21.)

American sugar.—The expectation (now almost a certainty) of the reduction in the duty on Cuban sugar has been the chief bull argument on sugar-trust stock, which has advanced on buying by Washington and sugar-trust interests. The sudden upward movement on Friday was coincident with a five-point advance in the price of refined sugar. (New York Times, March 22.)

The stock brokers' advice of Messrs. Haight & Freese Company, of New York, of February 15, 1902, is as follows:

THE COMING SUGAR STRUGGLE AT WASHINGTON.

FEBRUARY 15, 1902.

DEAR SIR: All eyes interested in sugar are centered on Washington for first indications as to what will be done relative to duties, the subject coming up in the interest of Cuba. Sugar is one of Cuba's greatest products, and the American duty thereon will have the greatest importance and bearing upon many interests, notably the American Sugar Refining Company. The question is, Will the United States reduce the present duty 25 per cent or thereabouts on sugar coming from Cuba or will it let matters rest as they are? Opposed to the action is the beet-sugar interest. In favor of it are the * * * President and the interests of the American Sugar Refining Company.

If the measure goes through Congress and becomes operative, the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company will have a tremendous rise and easily gross 150; if it fails, the stock would undoubtedly suffer quite an extensive decline. If the reduction becomes a law, the primary beneficiary would be the American Sugar Company, inasmuch as they would be in possession of the raw sugar instead of the planter.

Mr. Chairman, these facts ought to demonstrate to all that the American Sugar Refining Company will receive the greater part of the benefits extended by the passage of this measure.

NO ADVANTAGE IN RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

This bill provides that until January 1, 1904, we shall reduce the duty on our Cuban imports 20 per cent and Cuba shall reduce her duty the same amount on our exports to her. Nearly all our import from Cuba is sugar. We buy from that island three times as much as she buys from us. Her tariff rate now is on the average 21 per cent of the value of her imports.

Twenty per cent reduction on the rate will therefore be only 4 per cent of value, which is not a sufficient advantage to appreciably increase our sales in that country. We now have with Cuba all the trade which naturally belongs to us. She is buying our wheat, flour, beef, bacon, machinery, and other commodities and articles we export to foreign countries. Her reduction of duty will not cause her people to buy appreciably any more than they do now. Our producers will not get the benefit of the Cuban duty reduction, because the Cuban market for our products is too small to affect the world's price, at which we sell all our products shipped to that island, but the Cuban people themselves will obtain the benefit of the same.

Thus it seems that the reciprocity feature of this bill will be of very little advantage to our trade. But even if otherwise, it would be simply swapping off the prospects of almost the only industry from which the farmers derive an advantage from the tariff in order to give some trade concessions to manufactured articles which are already heavily protected and to the protected steel trust which sells steel at home at $1.65 per hundred and in foreign countries at 95 cents for the same quantity.

CONCLUSIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show—

First. That the sentiment in behalf of this measure has been produced by the literary bureau of the American Sugar Refining Company by the assumption of conditions that did not exist; that the passage of this bill will result in a victory for that company in its war of extermination against the beet-sugar industry of this country.

Second. That there is no obligation, moral or legal, upon the United States to give any advantages or revenues to Cuba or her people.

Third. That there is no suffering among the poor in that island, that her workmen are receiving higher wages than ever before, and that every man there who wants work can obtain employment.

Fourth. That the consumer in the United States will not receive the benefit of the proposed reduction in the duty on sugar.

Fifth. That this legislation will produce a check in the development of the sugar-beet industry of this country.

Sixth. That of the revenues lost to the Government by reason of the reduction of duty, authorized in this bill nine-tenths of the same for this year and more than half for next year will go directly to the American Sugar Refining Company.

Seventh. That the balance of the revenues so lost will go into the pockets of foreign planters who have failed in their venture to make fortunes out of Cuban sugar lands.

Eighth. That the 20 per cent reduction of Cuba's tariff can not appreciably increase our trade, but the benefits therefrom will accrue to the Cuban consumers and not to the American producers.

For these reasons I maintain the bill should be defeated.

Mr. Chairman, this measure will result in placing the sinews of war in the hands of a company which will use them to exterminate a legitimate American industry. I appeal to you in the name of justice and right not to aid a monopoly in its determination to annihilate an industry which promises to give fair remuneration to the farmer for his toil and labor. Instead of standing for a monopoly and foreign planters, let us stand by our own Treasury and by our own people. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a most unsatisfactory one. It is unsatisfactory to those who raise the beet from which the beet sugar is made; it is unsatisfactory to those who make the sugar from the beet; it is unsatisfactory to those who raise sugar cane in the United States; it is unsatisfactory to some of the Republicans who do not desire a reduction of tariff in any form, and it is unsatisfactory in an entirety to the Democratic party and the Democratic members of this House, because while it is a reduction of the tariff it does not in any manner reduce it as it should, and, I might add, my speech on this question may be most unsatisfactory to the Republicans and some Democrats. The Democratic platform last promulgated, a portion of which I quote, reads as follows:

PLEDGE TO CUBA.

We demand the prompt and honest fulfillment of our pledge to the Cuban people and the world; that the United States has no disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over the island of Cuba, except for its pacification. The war ended nearly two years ago, profound peace reigns over all the island, and still the Administration keeps the government of the island from its people, while Republican carpetbag officials plunder its revenues and exploit the colonial theory, to the disgrace of the American people.

This is my law until a new declaration of principle is announced, and, as you see, declares that this Government should get out of Cuba as hastily as possible, which has been held far too long, and that we should do all in our power to help Cuba become a great republic, standing independent and alone, but with the flag of the Monroe doctrine floating over its land, not as a menace to Cuba and its citizens, but announcing to the world our determination to uphold the Monroe doctrine. In that same platform, which I take as my creed, we declare against the present tariff law—the Dingley tariff. Here is what it says:

We condemn the Dingley tariff law as a trust-breeding measure, skillfully devised to give the few favors which they do not deserve and to place upon the many burdens which they should not bear.

We state that the Dingley tariff was a hurt and an injury to all the people. We ask for a reduction of the tariff. We now have at last, even as Democrats, an opportunity—even though it be but a small step—it is a chance to reduce that tariff. As a Democrat I therefore see no reason for us to do other than support this bill, which I submit is not a good one, which we know is not satisfactory, but which in a manner tends toward the end that Democracy has taught us to try and reach. I hope we Democrats will have an opportunity to vote for an amendment to this present measure giving a greater reduction than that presented and also taking the tariff off refined sugar.

There have been discussions on the other side of this House by the leaders from which I am led to hope that they have reached the dividing of the ways. I am led to believe that they see the handwriting upon the wall. I am led to believe that they see, and that they know, that the time has come when they must have a reduction of the tariff, not only on raw sugar, but on many other articles which they now protect. It looks to me, if we may judge by their speeches, that they are preparing for the fall that is bound to come to them, and that they are paving the way for the future. The Republicans are making this move, I believe, in order that they may, when the next campaign comes on, hold up this bill, however iniquitous it may be in its shortcomings, and say that upon this occasion, in the House of Representatives, they urged this reduction as a forerunner of what was to come hereafter, and they will be delighted to have us fight it. Let us not please them. No, my friends, this measure is a raking of straw in order that their fall may be softened.

Simply because it is a Republican measure and emanates from the Republican side of the House, are we as Democrats to refuse it? Are we to say that we will not help you even though you go our way and go our road—the right way as is laid down in the Democratic platform? I for one am unwilling to say that, and I stand here as a Democrat and openly declare that I will not be driven from the right, even though the Republican party leads. If the Republican side of the House is willing to go my way, I am glad to help them in my humble way. The perturbed condition of the minds of some of the members on the other side who are against this bill is really pleasing to observe; they are making apologies for this measure, as if to say that they are the better Republicans, a rather "I am holier than thou" kind of spectacle. It matters not to me who is the better, and criminations and recriminations will not avail them. I am indifferent as to which is the better Republican.

I know that this measure is unsatisfactory to them, but they are wise, they are astute, and they swallow the pill. I doubt not that, while they have their ruptures and differences on this matter, that when it comes to the time to vote upon any other question that may come up before this House they will get together and stand together in a solid phalanx, as they usually do, much to the regret of Democrats. They know how to lay down; as a rule, they sacrifice their ideas and opinions and indorse party measures. This bill is not satisfactory, Mr. Chairman, to the President of the United States. I say that because I judge him by his printed words sent to this Congress, when the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, said—I read from his message:

In the case of Cuba, however, there are weighty reasons of morality and of national interest why the policy should be held to have a peculiar application, and I earnestly ask your attention to the wisdom, indeed to the vital need, of providing for a substantial reduction in the tariff duty on Cuban imports into the United States.

This is not a substantial reduction; this is not the reduction the Cubans deserve, nor what they should get, nor what Democrats would give. Quoting further the President says:

Cuba has in her constitution affirmed what we desired—that she should stand, in international matters, in closer and more friendly relations with us than with any other power—and we are bound by every consideration of honor and expediency to pass commercial measures in the interest of her material well-being.

That, sir, is from the President of the United States. I, as a Democrat, say that is good, sound doctrine; I, a Democrat, say that it is right, that it is just, and I, a Democrat, commend the President of the United States for his utterance. I say this bill is not satisfactory to him, if he intended what he wrote, and I believe that he did. It is not satisfactory to him because, being bound by every consideration to help Cuba, it does not, as he says it should, to any considerable extent. He desires no such paltry reduction as this. His party leaders, however, prevailed on him, so rumor says, to accept this little.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is perfectly satisfactory, I doubt not, to the great trust of this country. It is not satisfactory to me, because I desire to bring the trust down on a level with the rest of the people. But he declares that it does not injure the trust, and I confess that I do not see that it helps them, for if I did no one would do more than I would to defeat the bill. He says that he would not commit any act that would injure the sugar trust. That is perfectly patent and reasonably plain, judging him by his party, and, too, we have his word for it. He says that it will not injure the trust, but that it will help Cuba, and he is willing to take $8,000,000 from the people and give to Cuba, but he is not willing, he says in effect, to take the $8,000,000 from the trust and give it to Cuba. So far as I am concerned, I would much rather that we get the $8,000,000 from the trust and give it to Cuba than to take it from the people. But, sirs, we can not get it from the trust. Oh, no; we can not hope for that under Republican rule. They are helped and aided by the Republican party, and that party is in power, and we can not hope to hurt them in any way, unless we can prove to the American people that the trust controls the prices and also the present Republican party, which seems to be the case. I would do anything in reason to break the power of that great octopus. I would call down upon them the just condemnation of an outraged people. I would do anything that I could for the Cuban people at the injury of the trust, but as we are powerless under the present Administration to call them to account is no reason to fail in our obligation to Cuba.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Do you not think, if this measure should pass, that the trusts will get the eight millions that is given in this reduction?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. No, sir; I do not; and I will tell you why. I believe that when this crop of raw sugar is brought into this country it will be sold, and it will benefit the Cubans to the extent of the 20 per cent reduction. That, I take it, is the intention of the bill; that is certainly the way it reads, and unquestionably the purpose for which it was drafted. We can only hope that the future will bring us further reduction, as expressed in the Democratic platform; and we hope there will also come a day when some kind of competition will spring up to fight the trust. I will say this: That if this bill and this measure does help the trust, then the Republican party is responsible for such a condition of things. It will go to the country then that the Republican party by their act did help the trust, though declaring to help Cuba; it will prove to the country what we Democrats are urging—that there should be legislation against trusts, more effective than the present laws which govern them; that the present laws are inadequate and worthless, and the consequence is upon the Republican heads, and they must take it, and the people can then rightfully judge them.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman does not want to be accessory to the crime, does he?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I hope not, certainly not wittingly; but I am willing to take the consequences of this act. I can not say that it will benefit us, but it is a step in the right direction, and that is all I care for; and so long as it is a step in that direction I am ready to take it. It is Democratic doctrine to reduce the tariff. I am against the Dingley tariff, and stand ever ready to cut it whenever and wherever I can.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The trust purchases all of the sugar shipped from Cuba, and they have the power to regulate the price. Does the gentleman think they are going to be so righteous and charitable as to give the Cuban people the benefit of this reduction when they have the power to take it themselves?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I confess there is little to be expected from the trust, but I will say this, that this is lending a helping hand to the people of Cuba, the people for whom we have already spent millions of dollars. As it does not hurt the American people to spend $8,000,000, I am in favor of letting them have it, because our money is expended anyhow. There is no danger of ever having an overflowing Treasury as long as the Republicans are in power. The Republican party will see to it that every dollar is expended. Therefore, if we are going to spend it, let us give it to the new republic, the republic that we have helped to make, and let them start on the earth in good shape and fashion. Then, too, my friend, it is Democratic to reduce the tariff. The opportunity to begin to cut is at hand; will you as a Democrat refuse to accept the chance?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I do not interrupt the gentleman to confuse or take up his time, but would he vote to-day to give a bounty to the cotton growers of Mississippi because they have to sell their cotton at  $\frac{1}{4}$  cents a pound?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I understand the argument of the gentleman, but I have only a limited time. I understand, of course, how the price of cotton is fixed, as the price of wheat and the price of sugar is fixed in foreign ports, and I confess that I would do anything in reason to help the people who raise cotton so long as those people are compelled to sell in an open market and buy their goods in a protected one. But that is not the point I am discussing. I do not think it is pertinent to the question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, raw sugar is pretty raw stuff. I know it is not used by the people in that crude state, but, as I say, it is a step in the right direction, its reducing; it will help, in my opinion, for if they reduce this article to-day, and it does not hurt anyone, on to-morrow we may hope for more, and if our sugar-beet friends will retaliate on the party (Republican) that is injuring them, we may soon see the tariff taken from off the refined sugar. How does that idea strike the gentlemen from Michigan and Minnesota? Down in my State when cotton is selling at  $\frac{1}{4}$  or  $\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound some of our people do not use clarified or refined sugar; they are not able to pay for it, and a little long sweetening in their coffee will help them much, and, as I say, let us start the reduction and hope for a long reduction and some short sweetening.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I would like to do so, but my time is limited. I think I can not yield to the gentleman now, but should there remain to me any time after I have concluded my remarks I will be delighted to answer any questions I can.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have expended much money in liberating Cuba. We have expended more in fighting the Filipinos in their far eastern islands in bringing about with blood and fire that "benevolent assimilation." I would like to stand here to-day and vote for a measure to liberate the Filipinos. I would be glad to stand here and vote for some measure giving to them a new government on the face of the earth. I would like to aid and help them. The other side of the House is attempting to make capital out of our acts on this side and criticised the vote of the Democratic party not long since on an appropriation bill because we objected to the building of barracks down in Manila for the soldier boys in the Philippines. That, sir, do you not know, was not a vote against the soldier boys; it was a vote against the permanent retention of the Army there in the Philippines, and all who know of the amendments offered know that to be the case.

My distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said, during the course of a speech made in this House in December last, that "he would sell the Philippine Islands if the worst comes to the worst." I can not believe that he meant that; he certainly would not barter away 10,000,000 people who came to us as they did. I would not barter away a country, much less a people. I would not sell for millions of dollars the country that has come to us as the Filipinos have, born in blood and blood now being given. What title could we give? "The one Spain gave us." She gave none, nor have we title, except by might and power to crush a weak nation who at first believed us their friends. I would turn them loose and give them their freedom, but money could not buy them. They are not ours by aught but force to dispose of.

Mr. Chairman, while touching upon the action of the Republican party in drifting toward Democracy, I am reminded of an item which I read with much pleasure in this morning's paper. It is an article which I want to read to you now, to show how the Republican party, or at least one of the distinguished members of that party, feels on the subject which is drawing us closer together, and which may finally disrupt the Republican party. I read from the Post of this morning:

[Special to the Washington Post.]

PINE FOREST INN, Summerville, S. C., April 9, 1902.

Thank heaven that the time has at last arrived when somebody has the courage to say the final word about a reunited nation.

President Roosevelt is the man. The occasion was his speech this afternoon in the auditorium of the Charleston Exposition. "The time was," said the President, laying aside his manuscript at the conclusion of his address, "when the statement could not have been made with truth that we were a reunited people, a people, indeed, and forever one. It can be said with equal truth that there was a time when it was necessary to keep saying it, because the assertion made it appear more true. The time is at hand, I think," continued the President, his voice ringing through the vast building, "that the time has already come, when it is absolutely unnecessary to say it again."

The tremendous demonstration which followed this remark and which made the rafters tremble, was convincing evidence of the approval it elicited in the hearts of his hearers. The speakers who had preceded President Roosevelt—Governor McSweeney, of South Carolina; Governor Aycock, of North Carolina, and Mayor Smythe, of Charleston—had all dwelt upon the fact that the country was now free from all sectional lines, but it remained for the President to take up the theme of unity where they had left it and insist that there was no longer any reason or necessity for repeated protestations of the South's loyalty to the Union.

Those are the utterances of a great man—the President of the United States. No man, Mr. Chairman, could give voice to such thoughts but who would be respected, admired, and loved that he dared utter them. Those are the words of a man who has gone among the Southern people to talk to them, to see and know them, to see their exhibition, see their thrift and industry, and see what they can do—to honor them with his presence. And to-day we are confronted here in this House with a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] which calls for an investigation of States, but which is aimed at the Southern States. Let me read the resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker shall appoint a select committee, consisting of 13 members of the House, whose duty it shall be, and who shall have full and ample power, to investigate and inquire into the validity of the election laws of the several States and the manner of their enforcement, and whether the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of any of the States or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of any of the States, being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for crime. Said committee shall have power to subpoena and examine witnesses, under oath, and to send for records and other evidence that may be necessary for a full and complete investigation of the several subjects herein mentioned, and it shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and to have such printing and binding done as it shall deem necessary. Said committee shall make a full report to the House of the result of its investigation at as early a date as is practicable.

How different is the attitude of the gentleman from Indiana, who is urging an investigation of the Southern people because, as he says, they do not conduct their elections fairly. How different, I say, is his attitude from that of the President of the United States, who has just expressed the sentiments as I have read. Let us compare the two men and draw a parallel of their positions and their declarations. We have on the one hand the President of the greatest Republic on the face of the globe declaring, in no measured or qualified terms, a condition which is at once inviting and most acceptable to the Southern people, whose loyalty, as he said, can never again be questioned. The President spoke not from hearsay, but from observation. He went down among the people of the South. He went down among the people whose men have ever stood up for what was right and just, as they understood and believed, and have never yet stooped to dishonorable methods. He went among a people who would not for personal gain use any weapon against a common enemy other than that which the highest sense of honor would declare just.

He went among a people who are hospitable, a people who have no feeling of class distinctions, a community in which the man who follows the plow is as good as the man who sits in his castle. He went among a people where the man who sits down to his humble repast of corn bread and bacon is as good as the man who eats his sumptuous repast at a kingly breakfast table. He went into a community where the women are beautiful and intelligent and are ever gentle, well-demeaned, and refined, where they are loyal to their husbands and love their children. He went among a people where the children are trained in domestic homes and are taught to honor their father and their mother. He visited a land which, though once laid waste by the devastating hand of war, has blossomed forth anew like the rose of spring after a winter's sleep and sheds its sweet perfume over a gladdened and harmonious country. These are the people he saw and came to know; this is the land he visited. These are the utterances of the President of the United States, the acknowledged head of a great people, a reunited people, a united people, if you please.

The resolution which I have read was submitted and urged by the gentleman from Indiana, and is the utterance of an individual coming from a State where perhaps the negro is a factor in politics as he is in strikes, and where the negro desires to dominate, and where individuals may hope to gain their votes by such methods as the introducing of resolutions in order that they may be returned to Congress.

I thank God that it appears to be the disposition of this House to let that resolution sleep. I believe that the leaders of the Republican party are going to allow it to stay in its present resting place, where it belongs, in the gloom of its own company, from which it should never appear and blacken the earth by one moment of its darkened purpose.

Speaking for Mississippi, I might say we do not fear an investigation, because our constitution, at least, has been tested in the courts of the country. But speaking for the Southern people, speaking for the South generally, I say that I believe the Republican party feels that it will be doing a proper, just, and honest thing in allowing this resolution to slumber in its present obscurity for ever and ever. [Applause.] We of the South are bound to view any such resolution with feelings of misgiving and grave forebodings. That no good is intended for us can not be questioned, and we are made to feel that such proposed legislation would be an especial thrust at a great and good people of a united

Union by a hostile partisan. We believe such an act would eventually call for a rebuke from the voters of the country. I ask the question of the Republican members, Will the Republicans believe the President of the United States, or will they follow the gentleman from Indiana? [Great applause.]

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that I have made myself plain, and have shown why I support such an unsatisfactory measure. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FITZGERALD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MASON, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I should take any note of the sentiments that have fallen from the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. HENRY of Mississippi]. I understood that he was to speak in favor of the bill. I believe he has said that he will vote for it. But if any part of his speech has been directed to the bill itself, it has been to give a reason for his vote upon it, with which not one on our side will agree. Whether it was exactly to be expected of him when he took the floor in advocacy of this measure that he should attempt to put its advocates as much in a hole as he could is a question which I must leave to the gentleman himself. It has not been my habit to comment on what has been said by others. I want to stick to my subject—to the bill itself—and I shall do so.

I commence by saying that this is not a measure which is advocated by us because it is a step toward free trade; and anyone who favors it upon that ground will make a mistake.

Mr. Chairman, I approach this subject in an earnest spirit, far beyond any mere question of business or moneyed interest. I want to vote upon this question as a man who is looking, not to the interest of Cuba, not to the pockets of any man, not, indeed, to the mere pecuniary interest of the country, but to the general welfare of this people. And I want to say that in my opinion the vital question before us to-day is not whether the beet-sugar industry shall be successful in the United States or not. I do not believe that this bill will interfere with a single American industry. But the vital question is not that. The vital question is whether Cuba shall have a coolly population and be another Santo Domingo, or whether it shall grow up as a free and independent nation, colonized by people who are fit to make it so.

All history emphasizes what I have said. Cuba is too near for us to be indifferent to what goes on there—not for her sake, but for ours. To those who speak about the interests of any industry of this country, I appeal to say whether the difficulties to which we have submitted on account of Cuba are not of greater consequence than the interests of any such industry in these whole United States. I appeal to my friend from Michigan or my friend from Minnesota to say whether during the old days Cuba was not the protector of the slave trade; whether the traders that ran there were not always slipping slaves into the United States; whether there was not constant friction with this nation on that account; whether, coming down to a later period, the insurrections in which the people there were engaged did not bring on collisions with this country which many times all but went to the verge of war; whether the affair of the Virginian did not appeal to us more than any question of trade; whether the destruction of the sailors of the Maine does not always so appeal to us as we recall the awful fact and the tremendous consequences.

History teaches us that we can not be indifferent to the welfare of Cuba. What is more, our own action binds us to feel such an interest. We have been strenuous in asserting the new development of the Monroe doctrine, which demanded of us that, as to all American nations, and, most of all, Cuba, we will maintain their independence, their territorial integrity, and the rights of their population against European domination. In the case of Cuba we have made it a matter of agreement—

That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

We have claimed and exercised the right and power to intervene to prevent any foreign domination. We did this in Mexico under the Monroe doctrine. In Cuba we have made this a matter of agreement and we have agreed with Cuba that if her liberty be in danger we will maintain it.

The Government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the Government of Cuba.

Mr. Chairman, those obligations were obligations to maintain a proper government. We have assumed no control. Cuba is free. We have rather assumed the protection of the liberties of Cuba and of its people in just government, and we can not be indifferent to what sort of people there shall be there. Questions of trade, questions of commerce, are subject to the question of who will be there. What constitutes the state? Men constitute the state. If we do not pass this bill, if three-quarters of the plantations of Cuba are sold under the hammer, what will happen? What better way could there be of putting them under the domination of the sugar trust than that? And over half are mortgaged—heavily mortgaged.

If my friends wish to give the sugar trust power, let them refuse to pass this bill. Mortgage foreclosures will give the sugar trust the power. But, whether it be they or other large land owners who get control of the lands of Cuba, their wish will be for labor, and if this bill do not pass, and it be possible for them, they will do what Hawaii has long wished to do, namely, encourage coolly immigration, Chinese or otherwise, under contracts, which amount to slavery, and will reestablish the cheap and nasty methods of the cultivation of sugar cane in that island. It is an island which has 41,600 square miles of land, sufficient, with the density of population that there is in Massachusetts, to accommodate 15,000,000 of people, although it has now only 1,600,000.

It is an island which, with the density of population that there is in Porto Rico, would have sufficient land to maintain a population of 10,000,000 of people. If this wonderful and fertile land, with its gentle slopes and fertile plains, and with its equable climate except on the immediate sea coast; if that place is to fill up with labor contracted for from China (perhaps contracted for from Africa—for who knows, in these days, but that this commerce may extend even into the midst of the Dark Continent?); if this country is to fill up with that sort of labor, it will be another Santo Domingo—neither more nor less—and we shall have to maintain the guaranty that we have given, not by the strength of the people of Cuba, but rather by the sword—by our Navy and by our Army—and by no other means.

If, on the other hand, as proposed by this bill, that sort of immigration and contract labor shall be cut off, if they can only admit population as good as that which comes to the United States, if the island can grow up as Texas did when it became an independent State and was peopled by the immigration of English-speaking people to such an extent that, although Spanish was once the language of that magnificent State, it is to-day almost unknown. If Cuba can grow in that way, if such growth can be encouraged by encouraging trade with America so that our capital will go there, so that their trade will come here, so that the affiliations between one and the other will be the same as has existed between Florida and the North, and that have built up that garden of flowers; I say if this can be done, the guaranty of independence costs us nothing. She has her independence, an independence protected not by war, but protected, created, and maintained by the sweet and blessed arts of peace.

Mr. Chairman, I have wondered sometimes why this clause of the bill has not been more attended to, why there has not been laid upon it more stress. We do not agree to give Cuba reciprocity absolutely. It is upon condition of the enactment by its government of immigration, exclusion, and contract-labor laws as fully restrictive of immigration as the laws of the United States. That condition is emphasized by the last clause of the bill, which provides that if these laws be not enforced it shall be the power and the duty of the President, whenever he shall be satisfied "that either such immigration, exclusion, or contract-labor laws or such agreement mentioned in this act is not being fully executed by the government of Cuba, to notify such government thereof, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported from Cuba the full rate of duty provided by law upon articles imported from foreign countries."

Mr. Chairman, the emphasis of this bill is given, and justly given, to this clause. It appears in the beginning as a condition, but if the condition contemplated by the bill shall not take effect, it appears in the end as a proviso, by which it shall be defeated.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly; I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does that clause not exclude the laborer of America, of the United States, from going to Cuba under contract?

Mr. PARKER. Under contract, yes.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then do you think it right that we should legislate to prohibit people in Cuba from contracting with laborers in this country?

Mr. PARKER. I would like very much to prevent, if possible, any contract which would take any man from Massachusetts to the West or from the West to the East if it be done by contract. It is not done in that way.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then would you legislate to prohibit a man in Massachusetts from entering into a contract to go to Cuba?

Mr. PARKER. I have not said so.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The bill so says.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. You are advocating the bill?

Mr. PARKER. I am advocating the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. And that particular clause you emphasize.

Mr. PARKER. I have emphasized this and the whole bill. I do not believe we want to fill up Cuba with people even from the United States who would not be fit to come to the United States, and you know what contract labor means.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. But the laws of the United States are now that you can not go abroad and contract for labor of a certain character and bring it here.

Mr. PARKER. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Would you prohibit the Cubans from contracting with American labor and carrying it there to develop that country?

Mr. PARKER. Custom in this country prohibits that sort of contract for labor, without any law against it. The gentleman knows that the population of the United States is such that you can not get a gang of a thousand men in one part of the country and take them off to another part of the country. The only exception to it that I know of is in the turpentine districts of certain parts of North and South Carolina and Georgia, where I have seen gangs traveling about on the cars from place to place, going in gangs, men and women, who were run by contract in that way; and when I have seen that, I have been ashamed that there could be no law to prevent it. The American spirit means the hiring of each man, and not the contract system that is referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Your proposition, however, would prevent a man in this country, skilled in farming, from going there and improving the condition of the people of Cuba.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It would prevent an electrician entering into a contract to go there.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. That is this bill.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Does the bill not say that no contract for labor shall be entered into by the people of Cuba in any other country?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir; it says that Cuba must enforce the same rules with reference to contract labor that we do.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Our contract-labor laws would prevent a skilled electrician in England from making a contract there to come to take a position in the United States.

Mr. PARKER. Any electrician in England will not find the slightest difficulty in coming to the United States to engage in work here. He can make his arrangements without infringing any of the laws of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. If he entered into a contract to come here he would infringe the law.

Mr. PARKER. Well, it could be arranged easily enough in that case. The gentleman knows what the contract labor system is and what the law is aimed to prevent.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Then you insist that the proper way to do would be to dodge the law or evade the law.

Mr. PARKER. I am not insisting that they should avoid the law. The gentleman knows perfectly well what the contract-labor system means. In nine cases out of ten it means not a contract with the laborer himself, but a contract with the boss of a gang, who brings the laborers. It is to prevent this that our contract-labor laws were passed. Whether they be right or wrong, whether they go too far or not, they are passed to prevent human slavery under the guise of contract—a slavery which I have seen existing in other countries and, alas, sometimes in this country itself.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. You have just said he could make arrangements to avoid that, and I inferred from your statement that you meant he could make arrangements to evade the law.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The law is that you can not enter into a contract to bring laborers into this country. Under this bill Cuba would be prohibited from making contracts with American citizens to go there. Do you favor that proposition in the bill?

Mr. PARKER. I would not want to import people from Cuba under a contract-labor system.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. We prohibit that now, but this bill proposes to prohibit Cuba from making any contract to bring in labor from outside that country.

Mr. PARKER. Must there not be reciprocity in all such arrangements? The gentleman knows perfectly well you can not have one thing for one country and another for the other. If we have a rule against Cuba we must allow them to have that rule against us.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. But we compel them to do it whether they want to or not.

Mr. PARKER. Better that than have a contract-labor system, which amounts to human slavery. The gentleman seems blind. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he want Cuba filled up with contract labor?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. No, sir. I want Cuba to make her own laws and execute them. I want her to be an independent government. I want her to be a country to make and execute her own laws without the aid of the United States.

Mr. PARKER. You are answering more than the question I asked. I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I will answer it categorically if I can.

Mr. PARKER. Does the gentleman think there is no danger of Cuba filling up with contract labor if we refuse to pass this act?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. There is only a possibility.

Mr. PARKER. Does not the gentleman think there is danger of it?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Only a possibility of it.

Mr. PARKER. Then I differ with him. This is the parting of the ways now as to that fertile land. It means either enormous plantations worked by contract labor or else it means that we encourage immigration, not contract immigration, but free immigration of Americans and proper immigration from all countries of the world into a country that ought to be the garden of Eden, a garden not because of its fertility or wealth, though it has both of these, but a garden because it ought to be filled with the best people in the world instead of the worst.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Do you contend under this law people from the United States can not go to Cuba?

Mr. PARKER. I do not contend anything of the sort. The gentleman asked me whether the contract-labor law of the United States would not prevent an electrician in London from making a contract. It would not prevent the electrician coming to the United States.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Any man in the United States could go to Cuba freely.

Mr. PARKER. Certainly. Of course there might be difficulty in making an arrangement which would end in employment. That is possibly so. If so, we could correct that by further legislation. We can not expect any bill to be taken up and completed at once.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Do you mean that we are going to keep on legislating for Cuba?

Mr. PARKER. We might make a reciprocity agreement with Cuba.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you hold that the sugar now held in Cuba is not largely held in Cuba by the sugar trust and not by the producers?

Mr. PARKER. I know so little about sugar, after hearing all this debate, that I am really ashamed of it. I do know something about the growth of nations; I do know something about the history of Cuba, and I do know also that if the sugar trust has large holdings in Cuba, those holdings will be doubled after six weeks of panic; and I do know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] in his speech said that the great bulk of the sugar was now in the hands of independent producers.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Independent of the sugar trust?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Held by people living in this country?

Mr. PARKER. By native Cubans.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Only 7 per cent is held by native Cubans.

Mr. PARKER. You are getting away from my position.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No; I am holding you right square up to the bill.

Mr. PARKER. This bill says, and the principal part of the bill is, that Cuba shall not be filled up with coolies, Asiatics, or Africans, and it is vital to her. Now, gentlemen talk of annexation. I do not believe in annexation now—I may disagree with other people in the House—I do not believe in it now.

If Cuba were filled with Americans and Americanized, I might say "yes;" until then I say "no." I will say what may appear a curious thing at first blush, namely, that annexation would hurt Cuba more than it would hurt the United States at the present time. That is a strange thing to say. But reflect one moment. At present Cuba collects her revenues by tariff duties. Annex her and she has to collect revenue by a land tax.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PARKER. Excuse me, I am on another topic. Is it on this topic?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You have said that you are opposed to Cuban annexation.

Mr. PARKER. Let me get through with my statement as to the reason why. If Cuba were annexed she would get no revenues collected either from a protective tariff or a revenue tariff, but she would have to take her revenues from a land tax. What is more, she would be overrun by the cheaper products of American manufactured goods, manufactured cheaper than by the hand labor, such as she has down there; and the tailor would give way to the ready-made American clothes; the shoemaker would give way to the American ready-made shoes; the carpenter to the American ready-made furniture; the blacksmith, who makes even the hinges of the doors there, would give way to American manufactured hardware goods.

From that moment Cuba would become forever a farming country. We have seen that same thing in some of our own States from the effects of free trade. We can point out one or two States in New England that are not as rich as they were a few years ago. That is true of part of my own State, where it is purely a farming country. Manufacturers have not settled there, and they have not been able to compete with the great West, and the result is, being Americans, they have moved away from the deserted farms. You will find them in the hills of New Hampshire and in New York and New Jersey, farms deserted by the young, where a few old men eke out a poor existence in their old age, while the young men have gone to the mills and the West, and into the great broad community which we call American.

Let gentlemen consider the results if free trade be put upon Cuba, whose people speak a foreign tongue, with a different education and different customs, and have no place to migrate to where they can take their places in the mills and upon farms. They must stay there and starve. All history proves it.

What has free trade done for Ireland? Her people were different from those of England; they could not find a place there; if they had been English they could have moved over when England manufactures crowded their own out. As my friend Dominie Robinson, an Irish Republican protectionist, said, "The best way to see the effects of free trade in a farming country is to emigrate to Ireland." Now, take Jamaica and you have the same thing. Jamaica is a part of England—

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman want to apply free trade to the West and protection to the East by the adoption of this policy?

Mr. PARKER. No. If the gentleman will wait I will answer him. Take Jamaica and take the Cape of Good Hope, take India, and in each of these cases the old manufacturers of the country have been crowded out by English cheap-made goods, and the people have been impoverished; they do nothing agriculturally and the wealth is falling away rather than growing up. Now, I will answer the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. PARKER. I am going to answer the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to know if I understood the gentleman correctly. Is he attributing the present condition of Ireland to free trade?

Mr. PARKER. It has been emphasized by free trade, and has grown worse within the last forty years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has nothing to do with it. It is the infamous policy of the British Government toward Ireland, irrespective of free trade.

Mr. PARKER. Well, I will drop Ireland. I will take India and Jamaica. I will apologize to the gentleman, for I do not want to get into a controversy of that sort. [Laughter.] I will say, on the other hand, that where you see colonies like Canada and Australia you find precisely the opposite. They legislate to protect their own manufacturers by tariffs against even the home country. They are growing, and they are all the more loyal because they are all the more prosperous. I do not believe in the annexation of Cuba. It would mean death to her to make her absolutely equal with us and on an equality of trade.

Now, I want to answer the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman asked if I wanted protection of the East and free trade for the West. No; I do not. We can raise beets as well as the West. The gentleman need not think we can not. We can furnish capital toward the beet-sugar industry as well as the West.

What is more, we take our medicine of tariff changes from time to time, and take it without quite so much fuss as comes from the gentlemen of the West. In my State we had an enormous leather business, but at the last end of the Dingley tariff law there was tucked in a tax upon hides, our raw material. It knocked out at first about one-half of the leather business, and we have had to go into other things to make it up. There are hundreds of examples, for my town makes thousands of different articles.

When we find it is for the good of the country that one particular thing should be treated as raw material and others as manufactured product, and we find that we suffer from it, we turn our attention to other things, as all Americans will do. And remember that these laws are meant for the good of the country, and every American will submit to them for that reason.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] desired to ask me a question. I will gladly listen to him.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to say that he was opposed to the annexation of Cuba, and he went on to give his reason—that it would result in the practical destruction of the people of Cuba. Now, I want to ask him whether such has been the result in Porto Rico, and whether there are not much stronger reasons for the annexation of Cuba than there were for the annexation of Porto Rico or the Philippines.

Mr. PARKER. I will answer the gentleman very frankly. At the time when the Porto Rican tariff was under consideration I opposed very strongly the abolition of that tariff. I believe time will bear out my view on that subject. I believe that through a succession of good crops Porto Rico has been more prosperous than might have been expected, but, on the other hand, she has had to substitute a land tax for the old-fashioned system of taxing the products when they reached the markets; and I am very fearful that if there should be at any time any failure of the crops, she will suffer the fate of all agricultural communities similarly situated—the fate that has fallen especially upon the Indian ryot—that is to say, most of her landholders will be sold out.

I am glad the gentleman called my attention to this point. I believe that the continuation of the Porto Rican tariff would have been to the advantage of Porto Rico. For a similar reason I believe that the Philippines are rightly preserving their right to a protective tariff for their own benefit, and are taxing even our own goods that are sent there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does not the gentleman believe that it is for the interest of this Government in the future to confer statehood upon Cuba as early as possible?

Mr. PARKER. I will answer the gentleman's question—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not the best policy that this Government could pursue to confer upon Cuba, with her consent, at as early a day as practicable, statehood, regardless of beet sugar or Louisiana sugar or any other consideration of that kind?

Mr. PARKER. I will answer the gentleman's question by saying that I am not willing to take in as a part of the United States any country that has not been practically Americanized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is not answering my question.

Mr. PARKER. I am answering the question. When Cuba has been, if she ever will be, Americanized and wishes to come to us, yes; until then, no. I believe that the policy in regard to Texas was right—the policy by which we first recognized her independence, then filled her with Americans, and then took her in.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And we pursued the same course with California. Now, does not the gentleman believe that the speediest way of Americanizing Cuba is to confer statehood upon her?

Mr. PARKER. On the contrary, I think that the speediest way of failing to Americanize her would be to do anything of that sort. We have not Americanized Porto Rico—not in the least.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Neither have we made her a State.

Mr. PARKER. We have given her free trade; we have given her greater opportunities than if she were a State of the Union. We more than pay the expenses of her government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We have not given her free trade.

Mr. PARKER. We have.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not absolutely.

Mr. PARKER. Absolute free trade.

But you can not Americanize a Spanish colony unless you make it profitable for Americans to go there; and the way we propose to make it profitable for Americans to go there, not merely to run sugar plantations but to do whatever work there is to be done, is by arranging a differential tariff, by reciprocity between that country and our own, and especially by keeping the coolies out.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not a fact that your opposition to conferring statehood upon Cuba is based principally upon the fact that when Cuba comes in as a State all these questions in regard to tariff will vanish, and there will be absolute free trade between Cuba and the various States of this Union, just as there is to-day between Massachusetts and Illinois?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir. My difficulty is not in regard to trade questions at all. My difficulty in regard to bringing in Cuba now is first that it would ruin her financially, and second that she has not, in my judgment, the people or the government to send proper representatives to this country, because they do not feel about things as we do, and on many questions we should not agree. There would be matters of politics and religion in regard to which we should always be in trouble. I believe we must Americanize that country first by giving her an opportunity to carry on a government for herself.

Mr. WILEY. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILEY. I understand the gentleman to declare that he will be in favor of the annexation of Cuba whenever that island has become Americanized. It has cost the United States about $250,000,000 to break the grasp of Spain's merciless despotism over Cuba, and to establish a republican form of government there. The gentleman has just stated that he favored that clause in the pending bill which will prevent an American citizen having property interests in Cuba from taking contract laborers from the United States and working them in Cuba. Will the gentleman, who is in favor of such offensive discrimination against the American workingman, explain how he ever expects Cuba to become Americanized?

Mr. PARKER. I will answer the gentleman. The gentleman seems to have misunderstood the whole of my argument. I will answer him by saying that it never would be Americanized if Americans could take contract laborers there.

Mr. WILEY. Why not?

Mr. PARKER. Because you would fill it with coolies.

Mr. WILEY. With coolies? Why, what are you going to do with the Southern negroes?

Mr. PARKER. Then you would fill it with negroes. Do you want to put on Cuba all of the difficulties which now result from the race question in the South?

Mr. WILEY. I have asked the gentleman a question and I would be glad if he would please answer it.

Mr. PARKER. I have answered it. I said that instead of Americanizing it you will destroy it. I do not believe in contract labor anywhere. I have come now to the end of my time, and I can not submit to any further interruption. Briefly, to resume what has been said, the most vital question now before the American people is not whether they will make a profit more or less in any particular branch of business, but the question is more far-reaching; it is a wider question.

It is the question of whether there shall be pursued in Cuba a policy which will attract and bring to her people who shall renew her life and make her cease to be the thorn in our side that Cuba has been for the last fifty or one hundred years; it is whether there shall be created in that island a condition which will people it with those who will be a help to us instead of a hindrance, a people who will help us to carry out the agreements that we have made for the independence of Cuba and for her freedom from foreign control; it is whether she shall be made the home of the coolie or the home of the independent farmer and citizen. It is not a question of trade; it is a question far beyond the matter of prices. There rests upon us a duty because we have assumed to protect. This bill lies before us as the path, not only of honor, but of simple, direct common sense, that in the end we may make of that country one of which this land, as its creator, may be proud. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DALZELL, having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12768) to provide reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 12, 1902.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MASON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved. It is approved.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MASON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 32, 33, 37, 39, and 40.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 20, 31, 34, 35, 36, and 38 and agree to the same.

* That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "edition" and insert in lieu thereof the word "editions;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 4, strike out lines 7 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Postmaster-General is hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress as soon as possible the advisability and practicability of purchasing and adopting a uniform metal lock box, at a price not to exceed 50 cents, for the purpose of selling the same to patrons on rural free-delivery routes at cost;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 4, line 24, strike out the words "less than $100 nor;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. E. MASON,
BOIES PENROSE,
A. S. CLAY,
E. F. LOUD,
GEO. W. SMITH,
CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as the conferees bring in a substitute for the amendment which I offered day before yesterday, if he has any information from the Post-Office Department as to how long it will be before the report which is called for in the conference report will come in? In other words, is there any assurance that we shall have at this Congress an opportunity to legislate on the subject of rural free-delivery boxes at a cost price to the patrons?

Mr. MASON. I am informed unofficially, but by one of the members of the commission appointed by the Postmaster-General, that they will report to the Postmaster-General within the next two or three days.

I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that, so far as I am personally concerned, and I can speak also for several members of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, we favor a plan of this kind, and as soon as the Postmaster-General reports upon the practicability of it we intend to bring in a bill making a slight appropriation for the purchase of boxes, so that it is the intention, or it is at least my intention, to carry out the spirit of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina at an early date, during the present session of Congress, if possible. I expect to bring in a bill and then ask to have it made a part of the sundry civil appropriation bill or the general deficiency bill, whatever bill it may be proper to put it on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand, then, one of the main reasons why this substitute was put on the bill in lieu of the amendment was because it carried no appropriation which enabled the Postmaster-General even to begin the business of buying and selling the boxes at cost.

Mr. MASON. That was one objection to the Senate amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then if the amendment which is suggested by the Senator from Illinois is incorporated in the sundry civil or some other appropriation bill the money will not necessarily go out of the Treasury, but money will be given simply as a means by which the Postmaster-General shall carry out the amendment. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER. For the purchase of boxes?

Mr. TILLMAN. For the purchase of rural free-delivery boxes for the purpose of selling them to the patrons of rural free delivery at cost. There is complaint at this time because of an apparent monopoly by which the patrons of the rural free delivery—the farmers throughout the country—are compelled to buy one of 14 types of boxes at a price which they think is exorbitant. Complaint has reached me from various sources, and knowing from my own experience as a farmer that it is an unnecessary and a very heavy expense on a great many poor people, I have insisted that something should be done by the Government to protect these people from overcharges.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what disposition was made of the Senate amendment on page 15, under the head of rural free-delivery service. The bill as it came to the Senate provided for the compensation of seven special agents in charge of divisions at $2,400 each, and the Senate amended the provision by providing that there should be ten special agents in charge of divisions at $2,500 each.

Mr. MASON. On what page is the amendment to which the Senator calls my attention?

Mr. MITCHELL. On page 15, in regard to rural free delivery. The House provided for seven special agents and the Senate increased the number to ten.

Mr. MASON. The Senate conferees receded.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Senate increased the salary. The Senate conferees receded?

Mr. MASON. The Senate conferees were compelled to recede on the showing made by the House conferees.

Mr. GALLINGER. Both as to numbers and compensation.

Mr. MASON. Both as to numbers and compensation.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that the chief of that division was before the committee and insisted very strenuously that the force is inadequate.

Mr. MASON. The House committee had the subject under investigation for a long time, and they having so concluded, the Senate conferees yielded.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also inquire what disposition was made of the Senate amendment as to inspectors of free-delivery routes? The House provided for 71 inspectors. The Senate provided for 75.

Mr. MASON. There is practically no difference. There is a change in classification. The Department recommended two classes, and the House passed the bill recommending four. The House had the matter under advisement and consideration for a long time; they took a large amount of evidence upon the subject; and the House conferees and the Senate conferees unanimously yielded to the judgment of the House, and agreed to the bill, upon the question of rural free delivery, substantially as it came from the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. By agreement, then, of the conferees the bill was taken substantially as it came from the House.

Mr. MASON. Substantially as it came from the House. I think there will be no objection to the adoption of the report.

Mr. LODGE. The House accepted that and two or three others.

Mr. MASON. They accepted that and two or three others.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair there is no necessity for such action. The bill simply stays here indefinitely.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill S. 2960, known as the Chinese-exclusion bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. VEST addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I simply wish to make a few remarks on the Chinese-exclusion bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts gave notice that he would speak this morning immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon. Will the Senator permit me just a few moments?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I will yield to the Senator with great pleasure.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss in detail the provisions of the pending measure. I only want to say that I sympathize entirely and fully with what has been said in regard to the propriety of excluding Chinese laborers from this country. I have so often voted and spoken in favor of such legislation that I do not consider it necessary now to give at length the reasons for my former action. It is sufficient for me to say, by way of summary, that I think any immigration is undesirable when it brings into this country people who want all the privileges and profits of American citizenship without participating in its responsibilities.

The Chinaman is a political, a social, and an industrial parasite. He comes here only on condition that, living or dead, he shall be carried back to the Celestial Empire, and it is not too harsh a term to say that he preys upon the people of the United States for his selfish purposes and is not willing to assume any of the responsibilities or dangers of the great problem in which we are engaged, the ability of the people to govern themselves.

This is all I desire to say in a general way in regard to the measure. I am heartily, I repeat, in sympathy with its general purposes. But I can not vote for this bill as it is, and I will give my reasons very briefly.

In the first place, there is a provision in the bill of the most extraordinary character, considering present conditions. The bill provides that no Chinaman shall be permitted to come to this country to any exposition or fair.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that provision was stricken out, and an amendment was offered by the Senator's colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], which was adopted.

Mr. VEST. I am glad to hear that. I was not in the Senate when it occurred. I will simply continue what I was going to say in opposition to it, in order to make my ideas sufficiently clear for my opposition.

The Government of the United States has already invited China to participate in the St. Louis Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and China promptly accepted the invitation. I am sorry to say that China is one of the few countries that has acted promptly upon the subject. To shut the door now in the face of the Chinese Empire would be not only a violation of international comity, but a shameful and indecent breach of hospitality. I am very much gratified to know that that extraordinary legislation which, as I am informed by a member of the committee, came into the bill in some mysterious way of which I do not care to speak has been eliminated.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

Mr. VEST. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. The mysterious way in which the provision came into the bill was by a direct request from the Secretary of the Treasury that the provision be inserted in the bill, and it was inserted as he sent it to the committee.

Mr. VEST. I do not care to enter into that discussion. I am not a member of the committee. My attention was called to the provision by a friend connected with a New York newspaper, and I could hardly believe that such a provision had come into a measure of this importance by the unanimous action as it appeared by the record of the committee reporting the bill. I am glad that it has been repudiated, for I do not believe that on examination a single member of the Senate would have voted for such legislation.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was present at the last meeting of the committee at which the bill was finally revised. There were five or six members of the committee present. When that final revision was ended there was not a word in the bill upon the subject of excluding Chinese from attending expositions. I learned it in a way which makes it no secret that the Secretary of the Treasury—why I do not know—addressed a letter to the Commissioner-General of Immigration, including in it the provision that was printed in the bill and requesting that it be inserted. I have understood that the Secretary of the Treasury has been an opponent of Chinese exclusion, and it has been a mystery to me, that I have not yet been able to solve, why, on his official or personal responsibility, he should have made such an extraordinary request.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not think the honorable Senator from Colorado has any warrant for stating that the Secretary of the Treasury is or has been unfriendly to the legislation providing for the exclusion of Chinese laborers from the United States. I think this statement ought to be made in view of what has just been said.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well; I simply said that that was my understanding. In addition to that I want to say that without an exception the commission from California who are representing the people of the Pacific coast upon the subject of Chinese exclusion were opposed and are opposed to the inclusion of any such provision in the bill, and at their request the clause that was in the bill has been stricken out and the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri adopted.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I will proceed now to discuss very briefly another clause in the bill, which, if it remains there, will prevent me from giving it my support, much as I desire to do so. It is the clause in regard to prohibiting Chinamen from coming to the United States from the Philippine Islands. I hope it will not be considered hypertechnical upon my part if I allude to what I consider the unconstitutional nature of this provision. It is impossible for me, whatever view some of my colleagues who stand in the same position may take, to support this measure with that clause as it was reported from the committee.

The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States provides that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction shall be citizens. If the inhabitants—Chinamen or not Chinamen—of the Philippine Islands are in the United States, they are unquestionably subject to our jurisdiction, and whatever may be said of the adults, their children born in the jurisdiction of the United States and in the United States are certainly citizens under the provision of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. VEST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. The clause that excludes children born in the Philippine Islands of Chinese parentage has also been excluded from the bill.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator to say now that as the bill stands all children born in the Philippine Islands since we became the owners or proprietors of that archipelago are citizens of the United States?

Mr. PATTERSON. I simply intend to say that the clause in the bill that prohibited such children coming to the United States has been stricken out.

Mr. VEST. But the adults are still prohibited?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir; that is true. There are nearly a million Chinese and Chinese half-bloods that the bill will exclude.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. VEST. Of course; with great pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Missouri yields, will the Senator from Colorado inform us whether the clause to which he refers as having been stricken out, relating to children born since our acquisition of the Philippines, was excluded upon the theory that they were citizens?

Mr. PATTERSON. It was excluded upon the theory that a number of Senators were opposed to that provision in the bill, and, because for reasons that upon consultation appeared satisfactory, that it ought not to be there, it was stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to know whether it was on that account; and if so, whether the clause was written in excluding not those born subsequent to the acquisition, but living there upon the theory that they were not citizens of the United States. I simply wanted to get the idea of the gentlemen championing the bill governing that particular part of the legislation.

Mr. PATTERSON. It often occurs that a question may be well answered by asking another. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in his opinion, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands at the time of our occupation of it are citizens of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; not unless Congress shall see fit to so provide. That is my opinion. In the treaty under which we acquired the cession of the Philippines it was expressly provided—

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. FORAKER. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will not interrupt me.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to make a statement in regard to my yielding the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. I am answering a question of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. VEST. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. And if the Senator from Massachusetts will favor me a minute he can have all the time he likes.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to have an understanding about my yielding the floor to the Senator from Missouri; that was all.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not aware that the Senator from Massachusetts had yielded the floor to the Senator from Missouri. I was not in the Chamber when that was done. I beg pardon.

Mr. LODGE. I gave notice several days ago, I will say to the Senator, that I would speak to-day immediately after the routine morning business. I was recognized by the Chair and in possession of the floor, when the Senator from Missouri asked me if I would yield to him to make a speech. Of course I did so, with the utmost pleasure; but I did not yield for general debate, and I hope that the Senator from Ohio will allow the Senator from Missouri to complete his speech.

Mr. FORAKER. I will not trespass upon the time of the Senator from Massachusetts. If I had been aware of what the Senator has stated, I would not have asked any question at all; but inasmuch as the Senator from Colorado has asked me one, I trust I may be allowed, for I can do it with a sentence, to complete the answer.

I base the opinion which I have announced upon the fact that in the treaty ceding the Philippine Islands it was expressly stipulated that Congress should determine the civil and political status of the inhabitants of the islands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair). The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senate, with the consent of the committee reporting the bill, has not stricken out the whole of that provision. The question whether the Philippine Islands are a portion of the United States or whether all the inhabitants, not those born since we acquired proprietorship, but the adults included, are citizens of the United States is in a very nebulous condition.

I desire to make no discourteous allusion to the Supreme Court or its decisions. I have great respect for that august tribunal; but after as much study as I have been able to give to the various decisions given in the Porto Rican and Philippine cases, I have been unable, doubtless from my own incapacity, to understand exactly how the judges of that court are upon this very important question.

I understood the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] to state the other day in his very carefully prepared and able address that it was our duty to give the benefit of a doubt to this bill and to wait with what patience we could what would be the ultimate position taken by the Supreme Court. I do not so understand my duty as a Senator.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to put a question in that relation, if it will not interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he can conceive of a mass of human beings amounting to 8,000,000 people who are not citizens of any country?

Mr. VEST. Well, that, of course, is a very difficult question to answer in any other way except in the negative. I believe that they are citizens of the United States, but whether I am right or not, whether the Supreme Court sustains my position or not, I have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. Of course, when the highest judicial tribunal, whose duty it is to construe that instrument, decides adversely to what I think to be the correct interpretation of the Constitution, I yield, if not cheerfully, at least absolutely to the finality of that decision; but that does not necessarily change my opinion. Until that decision is made, I am bound to follow my own conclusion after examination in regard to what the Constitution actually does mean.

To concede that these islands are not a part of the United States and that their inhabitants are not citizens, is to concede the whole colonial system to be correct, and that this monstrous doctrine, as I consider it, that the United States possesses all the powers of any government in the world, is correct. I may belong to that old-fashioned, obsolete school which teaches that the difference between this Government and the monarchies and empires of Europe is that we are living under a written Constitution with distinct limitations, and that we can not violate that written instrument; that we can not, as the monarchies and empires of the Old World do, follow whatever may be dictated by present conditions to be politic, without any sort of limitation upon governmental power.

But I do not choose to take up the time of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has been courteous enough to yield the floor to me, in any elaborate discussion of this question, which, I simply content myself by saying now, is in such a condition that the best lawyers in the United States are totally at variance in regard to what the Supreme Court means by its diverse opinions, delivered individually by its members upon these questions.

I hope, Mr. President, I may be permitted to say a few words about the debate on yesterday in this Chamber, not by way of criticism, but because I regret exceedingly that there was injected into our proceedings, without any regard to rules of parliamentary debate, a sectional discussion, which elicited some most unfortunate expressions and exhibited a bitter feeling, which I had hoped never to have witnessed again in the Senate of the United States during my service. My public career will end in a very few months, and I had fondly expected after the Spanish war that the men of the North and of the South, who stood together like brothers against a foreign foe, would continue to stand like brothers in this time of peace.

The people of the South are sincere mourners at the graves of Lincoln and Grant and McKinley, and no more honest tears were ever shed than those that dropped upon the bier of our last President from the eyes of men who had faced in battle the soldiers of the North during four long years.

The people of the North should remember that the South, too, has produced great and good and patriotic leaders. They should remember that Washington, Jefferson, and Robert E. Lee, the leader of the Confederate armies, were slave owners, and differed widely upon that question with their brethren in the Northern States.

I shall never cease to feel kindly toward the present occupant of the White House, Colonel Roosevelt, for what he said, in the broadest spirit of statesmanship and as a historian, in his Life of Thomas H. Benton, one of the American Statesmen Series, in regard to Robert E. Lee. He says in that most interesting production that Robert E. Lee was by far the greatest general that ever came from the English-speaking races, superior to Wellington, to Marlborough, and to his last great adversary, Ulysses S. Grant.

Yesterday, when I came to the Capitol, I was handed a dispatch from one of the family of another great Southern leader, formerly our colleague in this Chamber, that at 10 minutes before 9 o'clock he had passed over the dark river to join that great encampment upon the other shore.

Mr. President, I hope I may be pardoned if I speak very briefly of Wade Hampton, who is to-morrow to be committed to the earth; but whose memory will live for centuries to come among the people not only of the South, but of the whole country. I knew him well, and loved him sincerely. He was the highest type of a Christian gentleman—patient, brave, honest, and unselfish. He was not depressed by adversity, nor unduly elated by prosperity. Having lost all, except life and honor, he bowed submissively to the result of a great war, in which he shared the fortunes of his people. He never uttered one vindictive word; he never gave any wild advice to the people who were suffering all the horrors of reconstruction, and who only needed his advice to dare again the utmost that fate could do against them rather than submit to the ills they had.

He commenced his public life, as a very young member of the legislature of South Carolina, by daring to face an overwhelming public sentiment in his own State, in denunciation of the infamous slave trade, which hot-headed men sought again to open. Afterwards he found it his duty to again oppose the will of his people upon a great financial question, but he did it without hesitation, and faced political death, almost certain, as he had often upon the battlefield faced death in defense of what he believed to be right.

I am informed this morning by one who sat by his deathbed on yesterday that he met death as calmly and as patiently as he had met all the adverse fortunes which had come to him in his later years. He could say—and I know honestly—in the beautiful lines of Tennyson:

And though from out our bourne of time and place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I trust that no consideration for me has in any way hastened the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to a conclusion. It was with the most unfeigned pleasure that I was able to do him the very slight service of yielding the floor. I was glad to do it, no matter for what purpose he arose to speak, and certainly I think everyone must share with me in the feeling of deep emotion with which we have this morning listened to his eloquence, always beautiful and impressive, but never more so than on this occasion.

It is very hard, Mr. President, after listening to such words as those which are still sounding in our ears, to turn away to the discussion which I intend to take up here. After such feeling as the Senator from Missouri has expressed for his friend—a great man gone—it is not easy to return to the dry clauses of an exclusion bill, and I trust therefore that I shall meet with indulgence in dealing with the subject which I am now to discuss.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of earnest debate in the Senate about the two bills presented to us for the purpose of excluding Chinese from the United States. One is the bill of the committee; the other is the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The discussion has proceeded as if between those two measures there was a great gulf fixed. I think the broadest distinction between the two measures is that Senators have read the bill presented by the committee and have forgotten the laws now standing on the statute book, which the bill of the Senator from Connecticut proposes to extend.

There is no difference whatsoever in principle between the existing law and the law proposed by the committee. Both laws—the proposed bill and the actual law—aim at the same thing, the absolute prohibition of the coming of Chinese labor into the United States. There is no difference in their purpose. There is no difference between them and the purpose of the treaty of 1894. No question of principle divides these two measures. And, Mr. President, I think I may say that members of the committee who are engaged in trying to perfect and pass suitable legislation are no more disposed to be inhuman or unreasonable than other Senators who have been discussing this case.

It is accepted as the policy of the United States that the coming of Chinese laborers into this country is to be prohibited; it is admitted by China in a treaty, where she pledges us her cooperation to that end. What we have before us, therefore, to determine is neither a principle nor a policy, but a pure question of legislative detail.

At the beginning of this session I introduced a bill extending the existing laws for Chinese exclusion. I then thought that was all that it was necessary to do. I took up the question in committee, I studied it with a preconceived opinion in my mind, as shown by the bill I introduced, and I came to the conclusion that in order to have intelligent legislation on the statute book and to relieve a very undesirable condition of affairs, it was necessary to codify the existing law and regulations and to make a new act.

We are now living under three statutes—numerous Treasury regulations, decisions of law officers of the departments, and of the courts of the United States. The present arrangement is loose. The method, I think, is bad. I believe it would be far better for the Chinese, as well as for the United States, that we should act under an intelligent, well-considered statute than under a loose body of regulations and of overlapping and sometimes contradictory acts.

For that reason I gave a great deal of time and labor to perfecting a new bill. Against the great body of that bill no objection has been made. It contains simple arrangements for putting the administrative features of this important law into a practicable, intelligent, coherent form. To throw away now all that legislation without discrimination seems to me a not very judicious manner in which to legislate. If there are defects in the bill reported from the committee, it is, I think, the duty of the Senate to perfect that bill.

There are matters in the bill as reported from the committee to which I am greatly opposed, points on which I reserved the right of dissent, and as to which each member of the committee reserved the right of dissent. I hope to see the bill improved by the omission of certain sections and by the modification of certain others; but before we modify the bill, before we try to perfect it, to undertake blindly to throw away an entire body of legislation, whose main purpose is to put all these laws, regulations, and decisions into an intelligible and coherent form, seems to me a very poor way to legislate.

Mr. President, let me say a word first as to the proposed substitute. It intends simply to extend existing laws; that is, the statutes already passed, the interpretations of the courts and of the law officers of the Government, and the regulations of the Treasury Department made in pursuance of those laws, with the power to make further regulations to the same ends. Although that substitute has passed through two or three editions already, it is, I think, still imperfect. It makes no provision as to the relations which we shall bear to the Chinese in the Philippines. On that point the Senator from Missouri made one of his objections, that we ought not to shut out, and had not the constitutional right, to shut out the Chinese resident in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, I think it will be admitted on all sides that the status of the people of the Philippine Islands has not yet been determined by Congress, to whom the treaty leaves it. Therefore we have a large latitude in dealing with them.

But the status of the people of Hawaii has been determined. They are citizens of the United States; their territory is an organized Territory, not merely domestic territory, under the decision of the Supreme Court, like the Philippines, but an integral part of the United States and an organized Territory, and yet the Congress of the United States in its resolution of annexation provided:

There shall be no further immigration of Chinese into the Hawaiian Islands, except upon such conditions as are now or may hereafter be allowed by the laws of the United States; and no Chinese, by reason of anything herein contained, shall be allowed to enter the United States from the Hawaiian Islands.

Not content with that, we went on and passed an organic act. In that organic act we inserted these words:

Provided, however, That no Chinese laborer, whether he shall hold such certificate or not, shall be allowed to enter any State, Territory, or district of the United States from the Hawaiian Islands.

That organic act passed this Senate without objection and without a record vote. As has been seen, it contained an absolute provision which says that the United States has the power to exclude the inhabitants or a portion of the inhabitants of an organized territory from entering other portions of the United States. If it was legitimate to do that in regard to an organized territory, it certainly must be legitimate to do it in regard to the population of islands, the citizenship of which has not been determined and the status of whose people is still open to consideration by Congress.

We did not hesitate to exclude the Chinese of Hawaii in the most absolute way from entering this country; we did not hesitate to say that no more Chinese should be brought into Hawaii; and yet, Mr. President, in the substitute bill it is left open to bring Chinamen from the Philippines into Hawaii and from the Philippines into the United States, for the simple reason that the existing laws did not contemplate, as they could not have contemplated at the time of their enactment the exclusion of Chinese in one part of the territory under the jurisdiction of the United States from entering the mainland territory of the United States.

If the Senate, after consideration, is prepared to open the United States to the introduction of the Chinese of the Philippines—I do not mean people of mixed blood, for I do not think that restriction ought to be made—but if we are ready to admit all Chinese of the Philippines into the United States it is for the Senate to say so. But when the Senate and the Congress of the United States have prohibited the passage of Chinese laborers from an organized territory, inhabited by citizens of the United States, into the mainland of the country, it is idle, as I think, to argue that we have not the power to prevent the immigration of Chinese from the Philippines into Hawaii, or into the United States, or into Porto Rico. My own belief is that it is better to shut them out.

There is a large body of pure Chinese in the Philippines—men born in China and who emigrated to the Philippines simply for what they could make. The provision I suggest now does not touch the question of the mixed bloods, and I think if the purpose is, as I believe it to be, to exclude Chinese labor from the United States we can not draw the line on such points as that made by the Senator from Missouri.

We have shut out the Hawaiian Chinese. I think we have the undoubted right, and, in my opinion, it is proper also to shut out the Philippine Chinese. I do not think the proposed substitute meets that point. I do not think, moreover, that the proposed substitute covers the question of the introduction of Chinese into the Philippines. It may be argued that our laws extend there necessarily, but the situation in the Philippines is a peculiar and uncertain one. Large powers have been conferred upon the Philippine Commission; large recognition has been extended to their acts. It is not by any means clear that they might not modify the military order under which Chinese are now excluded from those islands.

I might as well say at this point as later in my speech that, in regard to those islands, in which I take a very particular interest, because I have given so much time and thought to them during the past winter, I hope the Congress of the United States will put it beyond any manner of doubt that the Chinese are to be excluded from the Philippines, certainly until such time as the people of the islands may ask to have them come in. I believe from all that I have been able to learn—and I have heard a great deal of testimony—that the people of the Philippine Islands, properly paid, under good laws, with ample return for their labor, are quite capable of performing all the labor of those islands and developing their great natural riches. General MacArthur, when asked yesterday before the committee what the Filipino people felt about the Chinese, used words which impressed me very much. He said, "They regard them with a shuddering dread." They have kept them out to the best of their ability hitherto, though the Spanish laws were lax in that regard. They do not want them there now.

I have no doubt, for Governor Taft and others so testified, that there are not in the islands enough skilled mechanics at this time; that there is a lack of that class of labor in Manila and elsewhere; but I had rather have them wait, I had rather the development would be slower, and I should prefer that they should progress less rapidly in an industrial and material way than to open the door of those islands to the influx of Chinese to be used by capital in the hope of a rapid exploitation. The people of those islands do not want the Chinese there, for when they come in and get hold they crowd the people of the islands out of all the small trades and businesses. As General MacArthur said, they regard the Chinese with a shuddering dread.

Now, in any bill which passes here, I hope, in justice to those people awarded to our charge, that whether our tenure of those islands be long or be short, we shall not throw open the doors to the influx of an immigration which the people of the islands so profoundly fear.

Mr. President, as to the bill of the committee, I suppose I occupy the unenviable position of not being particularly enthusiastic for either measure that is proposed. I think the bill of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is totally inadequate. I think the bill prepared and reported by the committee, so far as my personal judgment goes, needs some very serious amendment. I think it can be made an excellent law, much better than a mere extension of existing laws, which is only putting off the evil day, for we have got to meet this question of the revision of the Chinese-exclusion laws sooner or later.

To come now to particular details in regard to the bill prepared by the committee, one of the objectionable propositions—a proposition to exclude Chinese brought here for expositions—has already been stricken from the bill. There is, however, another clause in it which I think even worse. Traveling far outside the question of the coming of Chinese into the territory of the United States, the bill has taken up the exclusion of Chinese from the merchant marine. That can only apply in practice to vessels trading on the Pacific Ocean.

The proposition, when I considered it in committee and when some amendments modifying it and softening it were adopted, seemed to me objectionable. I reserved the right to oppose it here, and since I have examined it with more care I am convinced that it is rather worse than objectionable. It seems to me almost insane.

Let us examine it. It proposes to exclude all Chinese from any vessels of American register. Now, the effect of that, under the conditions which the merchant marine meets on the Pacific Ocean, would be to put every American vessel in an absolutely hopeless position in competition with all the other lines which employ Chinese. Every American line will, for the sake of self-preservation, pass under a foreign flag. Then the bill also provides that every foreign vessel having a Chinaman on board, as soon as it comes into port, shall give a bond of $2,000 for each Chinaman. Mr. President, that would require the owners of one of those large trans-Pacific steamships when it comes into port to march up to the collector's office and offer a bond of three or four hundred thousand dollars for the time it was in port. Bonds of that magnitude can not be got easily. They can not be obtained in a moment. They involve a great expense. The result of that amendment, taken as a whole, would be to put every American ship under a foreign flag and then it would send every foreign ship into Vancouver.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will ask the Senator if it was not the intention of the committee really to have the $2,000 bond apply to each ship, and is it not a mistake in the print here?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know that. I am not aware that there is a mistake in the print.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am inclined to think so. I entirely agree with the Senator that it ought not to be as it is.

Mr. LODGE. I knew the Senator agreed with me on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it would not be much of a bond.

Mr. LODGE. The present bond is $10,000 for the whole ship. That is a proper bond, a perfect protection. I do not agree with the Senator from Oregon that this was an accident. It was done, as I believe, to balance the objections which the persons who drafted that paragraph foresaw would be raised to the clause providing that no vessel of American registry should carry Chinese seamen, because they said, "We exclude Chinese seamen from vessels of American register and put them at a disadvantage with the competing lines, but we balance it by putting this tremendous burden on all foreign vessels which carry a Chinese crew." That, it seems to me, was the philosophy of the paragraph, taken as a whole.

But the ingenious hand which drew it overlooked the fact that while he struck the foreign vessel, after having driven the American vessel under a foreign flag, he sent them all alike to Vancouver, where alone they could carry on the trade profitably. The theory of that paragraph is that it is going to be a help to the American seaman. I will always vote for legislation to help the American seaman and the American ship, and go as far as any Senator or anyone else. It is a subject I have very much at heart. But this is a blow at American seamen and not in their favor. In the first place, there are not American seamen on that coast to take the place of the Chinese; there is no American labor seeking to get into the stokeholes and the furnace rooms of those ships. Most of the Chinamen who go, go as coal passers, firemen, cooks, in the inferior positions on board ship. The owners are only too glad to get American seamen on board those vessels, as I understand it, and the higher places are now all filled with Americans or men of the white races.

The second point is that the fundamental necessity for American seamen is to have American commerce, and if you are going to destroy American commerce on the Pacific, if you are going to send American ships under the foreign flag because they can not live against the others, and then if you are going to drive the whole of the Pacific business into Vancouver, there is no friendship for the American seaman in legislation of that kind, because when you destroy commerce there is not much pleasure to an American seaman to be told, "Yes, we have destroyed the commerce by which you live, but we have discriminated in your favor and against the Chinaman."

I hope and I have no doubt that the Senate will agree to throw out what is known as the seaman clause; that is, that we shall adopt the amendment of the junior Senator from Vermont, which has been very carefully drawn, and which I believe covers it exactly.

Now, I am by no means disposed to say that there are not other modifications which may be made in the bill with advantage. I have looked over the amendments of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who has given a great deal of attention to this subject, in detail. Many of them, I think, are excellent. Some, like the seamen amendment, I regard as absolutely essential, and I hope the Senate will consider those amendments and not hastily decide to throw away all the vast amount of intelligent legislation and codification in the committee bill because there is objection made to a section here or a section there. I think we need improvements in the present loose system of administering the law; and I repeat that the Chinaman, for whom so much interest has been displayed on this floor, is better protected under a reasonable and proper statute, keeping in view the fact that the object is the prohibition of the coming of Chinese labor, than he is under Treasury regulations which may be added to or enlarged or relaxed according to the temper of the moment and left thus to the mercy of the officers of the customs or of immigration or of the Treasury.

I think also, Mr. President—and this is a thing which is too much overlooked—that the purpose of the bill for which the substitute of the Senator from Connecticut is offered and the object of our existing law being to prohibit the coming of Chinese labor into the country, we ought to have and are entitled to have proper machinery to see that it does not come in by fraud. Now, Senators here laugh at these frauds, and they do not think there are many of them and that there is not very much shown. That is not the conclusion to which I have come. I think there is a vast amount of fraud. I think that Chinamen are being steadily smuggled into the country in various disguises and in various ways, sometimes by bribery applied to our officers and our commissioners.

I happened to clip from a newspaper, the New York Sun, an article which I will not read. I will add it to my speech as an illustration and which gave an account of a case that occurred the other day. Six Chinamen were brought in over our northern border dressed as Roman Catholic nuns. They each had a little breviary. The gentleman who was engaged in smuggling them was disguised as a priest. By the merest accident of an overheard conversation, as it appears from the account here, one of the Treasury officers had his suspicions aroused, and the upshot was that the six nuns were arrested after they got over the border.

[New York Sun, March 30, 1902.]

CHINESE DISGUISED AS NUNS—NEW WRINKLE IN THE SMUGGLING TRAFFIC WITH CANADA—THE BOSS SMUGGLER DRESSES UP AS A PRIEST AND THE BEVY OF CHINAMEN HE IS STEERING ACROSS THE BORDER WEAR THE SOMBER GARMENTS OF WOMEN CELIBATES.

HULL, CANADA, March 29, 1902.

"Say, Dave, did you notice anything strange about that party of nuns? They seem to me to be a most peculiar lot."

"No; I didn't notice them particularly. Why?"

"Oh, nothing much. Only their queer yellow faces struck me as they came aboard in Montreal, and they were too meditative or too holy to say one blessed word, far as I could hear, all the way out."

That was all. A careless remark and a laugh between a couple of drummers, but it led an acute Yankee customs officer to make an important discovery, which has already had an effect upon the National Treasury.

This officer quietly arose from his corner of the smoking compartment wherein the short conversation had occurred, and just as the Canadian Pacific Railroad train was approaching Sutton, the last but one of the Canadian stations before entering United States territory at Richford, Vt., approached the conductor with the query: "Do you remember where the six nuns in the car ahead are booked for?"

"For St. Johnsbury, if I recall it rightly," was the reply. "The old priest who sits on the other side of the car has their tickets."

The officer turned and walked slowly along the aisle, turning his eyes upon the priest and well-shrouded nuns as he did so. Choosing a seat as close as he could to the somber party, he spent the next few minutes in a vain attempt to catch some word or action which should confirm his suspicions. At Richford, Vt., he went his rounds among the passengers as usual, and the little reticules of the nuns and his own bag were handed to him by the priest. These contained nothing out of the ordinary, though the Book of Hours in each one was evidently quite new and unused as yet. The clergyman was, in his bland French way, most affable to the officer.

As he bent over in conversation with this courteous gentleman he caught sight for the first time of the faces of two of the nuns who, from under their voluminous head coverings, were intently watching his movements. Of their Mongolian extraction there could be no doubt, and the officer probably showed the effect upon his mind of this discovery by his too expressive countenance, for when the train next stopped, having doubled back again into Canadian territory, the priest, rising in his place, made a signal to his friends and with them left the car.

A few hours later the whole party was arrested while tramping along near Troy, Vt., by officers of the United States customs. A short search revealed a natty queue neatly coiled away under each wimple and veil of the nuns, and also the fact that four of the six were males. The supposed priest, whose language was rather unclerical under the provocation, most unwillingly doled out the fines and the amount of the duties imposed upon such commodities as Chinese men and women, and returned to Montreal by the next train.

It was pretty evident that he was a professional "Chinese steerer" who had guaranteed—for, no doubt, a good, large consideration—to conduct the party safely into the land of the free.

The capture has been kept as quiet as possible, in the hope that the illicit percolation of Chinese into the United States from Canada might be diminished. Within the last three weeks it has happened that on two other routes the same ruse has been discovered, and in consequence the religious disguise appears now to have been discarded.

It is noticeable at the present moment that Chinese laundries are being established in several of the villages within 10 or 15 miles and on either side of the Maine and Vermont boundaries. Already in one Canadian village some of the boys, who, as is usual in small places, take a keen interest in the doings of strangers, have remarked that when one of the Celestials visits Montreal two return, and at the post-office and at the hotel bars all kinds of theories are advanced as to what becomes of the visitors.

In all probability these laundries are merely deposits for the use of smugglers of Chinese, the surprising resemblance between these foreigners making it exceedingly difficult to keep tally of those arriving and departing. But given dark nights and bad weather and it is not difficult for the Chinese contraband to smuggle themselves across the imaginary line between the two countries.

If the roads are watched, there are the fields, and the whole boundary can not be watched. And when once in the United States and domiciled with some compatriot washerman—who would pass for his own twin brother—no matter how suspicious he may be, it is about as easy for a wide-awake customs official to catch a Chinaman as it is to find the proverbial needle in a bottle of hay.

A farmer near Pigeon Hill lately heard his mastiff having an argument with some one in one of his fields at night. Next day he found a loose coat made of dark glazed material lying at the door of the dog's kennel. What had become of the Chinaman to whom it had belonged has not transpired. But the farmer's next-door neighbor farms United States soil, so that it may be taken for granted that Uncle Sam received an immigrant that night who lacked the upper portion of his attire.

I put this in merely as an illustration of the ingenious devices which are resorted to, and I think in dealing with such people it is well to remember that laws which might seem very stringent and very harsh if applied where there was no effort to come in, and where an intelligent people were not attempting it systematically, become very reasonable and very natural under existing circumstances.

Before the committee there were developed three forms of opposition to this legislation. There was very vigorous opposition, represented by extremely able counsel, coming from transportation companies both by land and by sea, and I was very much impressed by the fact that although we had stopped Chinese immigration, and our Chinese population was declining, and there were no more coming here, the great transportation companies in the East as in the West, whose annual revenue reaches into the millions, found the transportation of Chinese so important and so large an item that they thought it necessary to oppose this legislation before the committee.

If, Mr. President, the indications of interest which I have seen on the part of transportation companies are any true guide, and I believe they are, for the transportation companies are managed by men of the very greatest ability and keenest intelligence, the 100,000 Chinese whom we have in this country pass their lives on the trains or the steamboats, and they are the most valuable traveling population that this country can show. I find no fault with the transportation companies. Men, of course, ought to look after their business interests, and I do not in the least quarrel with their doing so, but it is well to understand their purpose and interest.

The next objection is the commercial objection, that we are going to injure our commercial relations with China, and the third objection may be called philanthropic.

Now, as to the commercial objection, the ground of it is that we are going to violate treaty provisions. Mr. President, I am, I think, as firmly devoted to the maintenance of the sanctity of treaties as anyone can be. I have as deep a sense of our responsibility and obligation, I believe, as anyone can have. I would not knowingly violate any treaty obligation with any country on the face of the earth, certainly not with China. But there are some things well to remember. The legislation now on the statute book, which was put there as the result of an irresistible, popular demand, was undoubtedly in violation of the treaties then existing. To cure that defect the treaty of 1894 was agreed to.

Now, Mr. President, all the legislation on the statute book, all the decisions, all the regulations, all the methods of carrying out those laws, were considered when the treaty of 1894 was agreed to. Every vote given for the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut is a vote in favor of the proposition that every law existing in 1894, with the proper means of carrying it into execution, is in accord with that treaty. I think if Senators will examine with care the provisions of the bill, some of which have been attacked, they will find that they conform with the laws and regulations which existed at the time of the treaty or with the decisions as to the meaning of the treaty, made by the law officers of the Government since.

But the argument that they conflict with the treaty is always based on the treaty alone, and without reference to existing law. If it can be shown, as I think it can be shown in almost every instance, that the provisions proposed in the bill are in accord with the laws or regulations which were in existence in 1894, then the provisions of the bill are in conformity with our treaty obligations. I have studied that point pretty carefully, and I think a great many of the sections which are attacked, whether in themselves they are good or bad, do not violate any treaty.

It is also to be remembered, and I think it is somewhat forgotten in debate, that this treaty is not a one-sided document. China has certain obligations, and I should like to see Senators who are so particular about our taking care of our duties and living up to the letter of our agreement apply the same doctrine to China. The agreement in those treaties is that China should cooperate with the United States in the exclusion of Chinese laborers coming into the United States. If we have had any of that cooperation it has not been brought to my notice. All we know is that there are systematic efforts on the part of a great trading company in China to force Chinese into this country, and I think it is idle to suppose that the Chinese Government, if it were so extremely anxious to prevent the coming of Chinese here or to live up to its own obligations, could fail by proper methods to stop the coming of cooly labor.

Mr. President, the commercial argument is that we are going to damage our commerce with China if we pass this bill in any form or if we disturb existing legislation. Every exclusion law that has been placed on the statute book has been met with that cry. Every time Chinese legislation has been introduced in Congress we have been told that it would break up our commercial relations with the Chinese Empire, and yet our commerce with that Empire has increased more than that of any other nation. More than that, Japan had a war with China, invaded her territory, destroyed her ships, captured her forts, imposed a humiliating peace on her, and within three years the commerce of Japan with China increased from 9,000,000 to 40,000,000 yen.

Mr. President, commerce does not go on sentiment. The Chinaman is not going to stop selling us teas and silks because we keep out some Canton coolies who are trying to get into the United States. That argument has been used against every previous law, and it is used now against the proposed law, and there is nothing in it and there never will be.

I am as much in favor of developing our trade in the Orient as any man can be. It is one of the visions and the dreams of my public life to see American commerce spread over the Pacific and become the leading commerce of the Orient. But it is idle to say that our domestic regulations as to a particular kind of immigration will destroy our commerce in the East. It never has done so. It will not do so now.

Only last night I was reading Men and Memories, by the late John Russell Young, which has just been published. He was minister to China and knew Li Hung Chang well, describes him fully, and gives the opinions of the great Chinese statesman upon a great variety of questions. He says:

"Li Hung Chang never took any interest in the immigration question; he never had any soul or heart in it, and, when I once tried to speak to him about it, remarked, 'Oh, that is of no consequence. It is an English trade question.'"

That is exactly what it is. The Chinese who are sent to this country are sent just as goods would be sent here. They are sent simply to make profit; profit for the company, profit for themselves, and with the plan of taking themselves and their profits ultimately out of the country and substituting some other laborers in their places. They do not intend to come here to build homes, to become citizens. It is a mere trade system, and they are smuggled in just as you would smuggle in prohibited goods. You can not apply to them the same reasoning that you would apply to the migration of other people, because it does not rest on that basis at all. It is a mere trade question, as Li Hung Chang said, and nothing else. It is "How much money can we get out of this country by putting Chinese labor in here?" It is not sentimental with them the least in the world.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAIRBANKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. With great pleasure.
Mr. DOLLIVER. I note that the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, which seems to be in pretty close contact with our present oriental trade relations, sends a protest here against the provisions of the committee bill in respect to the treatment of Chinese merchants in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. There has been a great deal said about the treatment of Chinese merchants under the provisions of this bill. Now, if Senators will examine the clause in regard to merchants, they will find that it is based in exact words on existing law and Treasury regulations, and where it goes beyond them, if it goes beyond them so as to impose any injustice on the Chinese, I hope it will be amended, and I am ready to say that I hope an amendment, which I am not sure whether the Senator from Vermont has included amongst his or not, will be offered; that is, the amendment in regard to five bona fide traveling agents from a single house.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is in.
Mr. LODGE. That is one of the amendments we should adopt if it can be done with safety. I was examining the amendment in the report last night, and I thought the Senator from Vermont had offered it here, and I am very glad he has. I do not want to do anything to keep any bona fide merchants out of this country, but what Senators do not understand, it seems to me. Senators who have not heard the testimony and given the time to it that some of the rest of us have, is that there is no trouble now as to a genuine merchant or a genuine teacher or a genuine student coming into this country. The difference between them and the class which it is designed to prohibit is extremely broad. There is a physical difference. There is an utter difference of appearance, and the universal testimony is that genuine merchants are not kept out, and we do not want to make the coming of those merchants unreasonably difficult. We do not want to put provisions on them which would be obnoxious. I quite agree with that.

But it must be remembered that there is a constant effort to smuggle in Chinese cooly laborers in the guise of merchants. They had an arrangement at one time under which they undertook to come in by showing they had an interest in a firm, and they would be given a nominal interest in some Chinese firm in Chicago or San Francisco or New York or somewhere and brought into the country, and then they would go to work as manual laborers. That has been stopped by a regulation of the Department and a ruling in regard to their having an interest in a business firm.

What I want to get at is to admit genuine merchants and genuine teachers (very few of them will come) and genuine students. I want to let them in; but if you are going to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers, you must have some method of detecting fraud, and the only question is, How shall you frame your legislation? We are all agreed as to the prohibition of Chinese cooly labor.

Now, the only question that remains is, How are you going to keep it out? What is the best method to adopt? My position—if I may be pardoned the repetition—is that the simple extension of existing law is putting off an inevitable question, is meeting the existing conditions imperfectly, is avoiding what we had better meet now, and that the true way is to take this bill, let the Senate examine it, and if they wish in their wisdom to amend it, to do so. I am not wedded to any part of it. I merely want to get intelligent, coherent, good legislation. The present legislation is neither.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. With very great pleasure.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I believe we are all agreed on that, but if I have correctly understood some of the documents which have been read here, the San Francisco people are on record in a memorial asking Congress to reenact the present law, and describing it as having had a beneficent and effective operation; and the census reports seem to confirm the truth of that statement.

Mr. LODGE. That is the petition of a great mercantile body.

Mr. HANNA. May I be permitted for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. I have received a telegram this morning, which I presume it is proper to read in connection with this discussion. I happen to know one of the gentlemen, and therefore I will read it:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 11, 1902.

Hon. M. A. HANNA,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned committee on direct steamship connection with Manila, which, as representative of the commercial interests of San Francisco, had the pleasure of meeting you last May, respectfully urge your assistance in defeating exclusion bill as now presented in Senate, on the grounds that such bill is unnecessary and injudicious, inasmuch as it will so severely cripple our commerce with China as to render it practically impossible for any steamship company now established on the Pacific to operate and maintain direct communication with the Philippines. The reenactment of Geary Act would amply protect all labor and other important American interests, and not only allow maintenance present trade relations with China, but enable us secure the greatly increased trade which all conditions indicate is surely within our grasp.

GEO. W. MCNEAR.
GEO. A. NEWHALL.
ANDREW CARRIGAN.

That is signed by George W. McNear, who is president of the Merchants' Exchange of San Francisco; George A. Newhall, president of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, and Andrew Carrigan, who I understand to be a very large and influential merchant.

I have received another telegram:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 11, 1902.

Hon. M. A. HANNA,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I earnestly protest against passage of exclusion act as now framed in Senate, because it will cripple commerce of the Pacific. Will destroy trade with China, without which volume this port can not maintain proper service other oriental countries. Reenactment Geary law will fully protect this country's interests and yet enable us maintain and probably greatly increase the commerce between China and United States, and particularly commerce of the port of San Francisco. I find this to be the unanimous sentiment all merchants with whom I have conferred, and all others truly interested in the mercantile welfare of the United States and particularly of the Pacific coast and port of San Francisco.

ANDREW CARRIGAN.

While I am on my feet, I will ask the privilege to read an antidote to those two telegrams:

MANSFIELD, OHIO, April 11, 1902.

Hon. M. A. HANNA, Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Bartenders' International League No. 252 insists on your supporting the Chinese-exclusion bill in every essential.

W. W. ROBINS.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, I have no doubt the time has been when the Senator from Ohio has found even the bartenders' vote a useful one—and they have a good many. I do not think this is a question to be decided merely by single petitions from this body or that body. I have taken the occasion to look at the whole body of petitions, and those in favor of this legislation represent pretty nearly the entire organized labor of this country, an opinion which ought to be seriously considered. I have had some experience with immigration questions; and I think there can be no doubt as to what the general feeling among the great mass of American workingmen is on this question; and if Senators have any doubt as to what their feeling is, they can omit legislation on the subject before May 5, leave open the doors to Chinese labor, and see what happens next autumn. My own impression is that they would find out the opinion of the American people. I think the House has an impression in that direction, too, and they are going to run for election; we are not. But I think all this is rather beside the question.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. With great pleasure.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to ask the Senator whether he indorses that feature of the pending bill which gives a narrow definition of the word "student?" Does he not consider that to be a violation of the third article of the treaty—

Mr. LODGE. I do not.

Mr. QUARLES. Which permits students, without any limitation, to come into our country, while by the bill you propose to admit a very limited class of students.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator raised that question. The treaty says "students" without defining them, but at the time the treaty was passed there was a law on the statute book in regard to them, and the treaty was made in consideration of that law; and the Senator is going to vote that that law then in existence is all right and in conformity with the treaty. The student provision, if I remember it, is taken word for word from the Treasury interpretation of that law, and when you vote to continue existing laws you simply vote for what is in the bill of the committee.

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator will pardon me, I find by section 2 of the act of 1888 that students are to be permitted to come in without any limitation, except that it is provided in section 2 that they are to receive identification certificates from the consul. So that so far as existing law is concerned—

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will observe that I did not stop there. I said the law was interpreted by the law officers of the Government in a certain way and has been executed in that way, and this is the way the officers of the Government now execute the law.

Mr. MITCHELL. And without any protest from China?

Mr. LODGE. And without any protest from China.

A Chinese student is "a person who intends to pursue some of the higher branches of study, or one who seeks to be fitted for some particular profession or occupation for which facilities of study are not afforded in his own country; one for whose support and maintenance in this country, as a student, provision has been made, and who, upon completion of his studies, expects to return to China."

That is the language of the bill. That is the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury as to what the existing law, made at the time the treaty came into existence, meant.

Mr. QUARLES. I take it the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts would not surrender his own opinion as to whether this was a violation of a treaty to any official of the Treasury Department. I certainly would not. My interrogatory to the distinguished gentleman was to ascertain whether he approves of this provision in the pending bill.

Mr. LODGE. Whether I approve of the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury?

Mr. QUARLES. Whether the distinguished Senator approves of this provision of the bill, when it is compared with the treaty, and appears at least to be in derogation of it?

Mr. LODGE. I do approve of it, and I think it is not in derogation of the treaty as it is set forth here in the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury and also set forth in the Treasury decision; and after all, though my opinion, if adverse, might be a great deal better than that of the opinion of the Treasury, the Treasury is going to enforce the law. Of course it is quite possible that you can get law officers there who will relax the laws. I do not say that that may not be done.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I will not interrupt the Senator unless he desires it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object in the least. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it be true that the bill with regard to the coming of students simply puts into form the law as interpreted by a Treasury official and as determined by Treasury decisions, is it not better to leave that, so that if hereafter it be found that students may be admitted not of the class which are specified in the Treasury regulations without impairing our ability to keep out laborers, it being in the shape of Treasury regulations and not in a statute which can not be changed?

Mr. LODGE. This illustrates my meaning very well. Under the Treasury decisions the Chinese student who comes here to study English can not be admitted. That is held by the Treasury to cover laborers coming under a pretense. Under this bill, however, the student of English can come, because nobody can say that English in some of our universities and elsewhere can not be regarded as one of the higher branches of study. The law is less drastic than the interpretation under which we are now acting.

But even if the provision in the bill were not less drastic than the existing interpretation, why can not the Senate consider that definition of student? If they think it is too rigid, modify it, but why leave it open for settlement and interpretation to the casual Treasury official, to the man who comes from the necessities of the case to regard every Chinaman who comes to the country as his natural enemy? Why leave it to him to frame regulations? Why not define in reasonable terms a student? If the Senate thinks that provision in the bill too severe, let them modify it. You must have some test to define what a student is. You can not let a man in who merely walks up the wharf and says, "I am a student." You must have some test to determine whether he is a genuine student, and I think it is better to put that test in the form of law rather than leave it, as I have said, to the casual interpretation of one Treasury official after another. I think it is a more intelligent way to legislate.

I am not wedded to this definition of student. I have no doubt the Senator from Connecticut can devise a far better one; but let us have in the bill what we mean when we say student; let us put in what we mean when we say teacher, and what we mean when we say merchant. We are capable of putting in suitable definitions here if these are not suitable.

But while I am not wedded to that phrase, I do say that there is absolutely no ground for pretending that anything in the bill which follows existing law and the interpretation thereof by the duly constituted authorities is in violation of the treaty. The treaty was made in contemplation of all those laws and of the fact that the Treasury was to issue regulations and to interpret them.

Now, Mr. President, the philanthropic argument, and undoubtedly there is a certain amount of philanthropic opposition to Chinese legislation, I will not enter into. It was not largely presented to the committee. The opposition before the committee rested chiefly upon the commercial ground; but the philanthropic feeling, of course, found more or less expression. I do not think the committee intend—I certainly know it is not my intention—to vote for any legislation that is not humane and reasonable.

My friend, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], was so moved the other day by the probable sufferings of the Chinese under this bill that he described in a most picturesque way two Chinamen who were brought before us. They had been arrested here for a violation of the law, and the marshal brought them before the committee. The impression made on my mind was somewhat different from that made on the mind of the Senator from Vermont. I thought they regarded us with the impassive contempt and indifference characteristic of the oriental.

Mr. SPOONER. Where were they brought from?

Mr. LODGE. They were in the custody of the marshal. I do not know where he brought them from. The Senator from Vermont said we put them on the rack. Mr. President, I certainly did not mean to put anybody on the rack. And yet I asked one question of those witnesses.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. LODGE. I am reading from page 71.

Senator LODGE. I should like to ask if these men knew that the papers which were given them were fraudulent?

Mr. POWDERLY. They undoubtedly did. They knew they were not merchants. They can read their own language.

Senator LODGE. What do they say?

CHARLES KEE (after speaking in Chinese with Chan Ling). He says he do thoroughly understand it. He says gave the picture in four months' time before his papers. Was called genuine merchant papers to let him in this country.

That was the extent of my racking the Chinese. I went no further. Then the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] took him in hand, and he asked him five questions. He asked him why he wanted to come to this country; what business he was engaged in here; who was Hip Lung, as that was the business firm he was coming to join, and whether he had a money interest in the firm. Those witnesses were asked just six questions. I have read the questions to the Senate because I know my friend the Senator from Vermont did not mean to convey the idea that the Senator from Colorado and myself were torturing innocent men.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I certainly did not intend to be understood as intimating that the members of the committee were to blame for that transaction, but if the Senator will read what Mr. Powderly said when those men were brought before the committee and will bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that although one of them had been here four years the night before orders were sent out and these two men were arrested and held overnight, without counsel, without suggestion, and were thoroughly interrogated by the officers of the Treasury Department through its interpreter, and then in the morning instead of following the law and taking them before a commissioner he brought them into the capital of the nation and made an exhibit of them as those who were illegally here concerning whom there was no doubt, the Senator will agree with me that that was something worthy of criticism.

But I wish at this time to say that I had no thought of criticizing any part the Senators took in the proceeding. The questions that were put were put through an interpreter while the men were in the room.

Mr. LODGE. The interpreter was cross-examined at great length.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The answers that came from the interpreter conveyed the information that had been acquired from the Chinamen who had been brought before the committee when they had no counsel.

Mr. LODGE. As the responsibility of this thing might as well be fixed, I also want to read what Mr. Campbell, the Treasury agent, said:

They were arrested late last evening and committed last night. It was suggested and approved of by Mr. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, that these men should be brought here in order that the committee might see the kind of material that the Bureau and the Department have to deal with.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Who was the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Gage. It was done, he said, on the suggestion and approval of Mr. Gage.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Who said that?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Campbell, Treasury agent. He brought them under direction. I do not mean to weary the Senate with testimony, but in this connection they undertook to bring in 117 men in one year as partners in one firm at Chicago. They tried to bring them in through North Dakota. That is a fraud. I do not believe in getting them in in that way.

Mr. DOLLIVER. How could it possibly be done under the present law except by the connivance and corruption of the Treasury agent at the port of entry?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Did they get in?

Mr. LODGE. They were stopped, of course. We caught 117. I am only pointing it out as an illustration. The percentage of those caught I take to be very small.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If the difference between a student and a merchant is such as the Senator describes, it appears to me that it would be perfectly easy to detect the cooly laborer if you had an honest official at the port of entry.

Mr. LODGE. There is a great deal of corruption used in some of those ports of entry, if I am correctly informed. I have no direct proof of that, but I think it is the case.

Mr. SPOONER. It can not be done without a violation of the law?

Mr. LODGE. No. It is done by the commissioner before whom they are brought in some cases; I think in other cases by officers. It is worth about $100 to smuggle one of those men in—I mean it is worth while to pay a commissioner $100.

Mr. SPOONER. Will you get any better men under this proposed law than you have now?

Mr. LODGE. No; but I think you can prevent these frauds. Of course, no law will prevent corruption that I am aware of. You can not make men moral by statute. Now, Mr. Campbell says:

I should like to say, in reference to this particular business the interpreter refers to—the Hip Lung Company, of Chicago—that in 1898 alleged members of their firm in Chicago were finally discovered and 36 were arrested on the border as endeavoring to secure admission unlawfully. Of the 36, 19 were ordered deported, 4 or 5 of them were admitted as natives, 6 or 7 were admitted as merchants, and the rest of them jumped their bond.

That is the record in one particular case, but it is a typical case.

I only use those as illustrations to show why it is necessary to have some provision to define merchants. If you simply say, in the language of the treaty, that Chinese merchants, students, and teachers can come into this country, you will have a million laborers here in five years. You have got to apply some test; you must do it. If you do not, the country will be flooded by them. If it is the wish of Congress to flood the country with Chinese labor, of course that is another proposition, but we all profess to be in favor of excluding them, and, if we mean to exclude them, we ought to do it intelligently and thoroughly.

One great misconception that I have seen running through these debates is that we treat the Chinese and talk about them as if they were a lot of simple, guileless savages, as if they were negroes from the interior of Africa or Indians from the interior of South America, a kindly but savage or semibarbarous people.

The truth is widely different from this conception. The Chinese, Mr. President, live under one of the oldest civilizations in the world. They produced one of the greatest of philosophers, poets, and thinkers five hundred years before the Christian era, before Rome had reached her greatness. They have a civilization that has been great in art, great in poetry, great in literature. Our ancestors were running wild in the woods of Europe when they were a highly civilized people. They do not come here with admiration for our civilization. They come here with contempt for it. They are children of a civilization older and, as they think, mightier than ours. They differ from us in many of their ways and habits. It does not follow that they are worse for that, but when they come to this country they do not come to seek our civilization or to adopt our habits. They come to a country whose civilization they despise. They are a highly educated and very astute people. The great difficulty, in my judgment, is the fact that they are products of a civilization which has been not only high and intelligent but which has shown itself immutable and immovable.

Do you suppose that the Chinese who come here come ignorant of the law, to be caught in the mesh of American astuteness? The Chinese know the law and the way to get into this country better than any Senator in this Chamber. They employ the best counsel. They are familiar with every device. They will know every word of this debate. There is not a Chinaman who comes to these shores who is not instructed on every single point as to how to get in. They are as acute and as astute as they can possibly be. They regard us as the Greeks regarded the rest of the world. Everybody outside of the Greek language was a barbarian, and the Chinaman regards everybody outside of the sacred boundaries of his Empire as a barbarian also. They come to us in that attitude, and they come with keen intellects and sharp intelligence, knowing exactly what they mean to do. Such a people trying to evade our laws and get into our country require thorough restrictions and careful tests if we are to keep them out.

We have been met at every stage of this debate by what I may call the census argument. I do not think it is very much of an argument, Mr. President, whether you accept the census figures or not. The fact that crime decreases does not seem to me to be a good reason for relaxing laws against murder. If the census figures are correct, then the laws have worked pretty well; but, heretical as it may seem, it is quite within the bounds of truth to say that a census may make mistakes. The census made a gigantic mistake not so many years ago in regard to the black population of the Southern States. I think it was the census of 1870 when a mistake was made which was only disclosed when the more accurate census of 1880 developed an increase of negroes so abnormal that it was seen at once that the census of 1870 must have been very defective. That was a great error in the census, caused by its coming against an ignorant people who were not interested in giving information, who, perhaps, in many cases were frightened at being cross-questioned, and so merely out of ignorance and unwillingness of that sort the census failed of correctness.

Here in the Chinese you have a people every one of whom knows that he does not want to be in the census, a people who know perfectly well that it is of the utmost importance to show a decline (it is entirely understood by them) in the number of Chinese in the country. The Treasury experts who have looked into this thing year after year and year after year and made counts in certain localities, estimate that there are 300,000 Chinese in this country, three times as many as the census gives.

I know that it is a fashion to laugh at the Treasury expert and to take the census as absolutely right in this debate; but I happened to stumble on a fact the other day which interested me. I was talking with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] upon the subject of this bill. He told me in the course of conversation that he had been looking up the condition of the Chinese in Wheeling. I asked him how many there were there. He said the clerk of the city there, who had charge of such things, informed him that there were as a rule in Wheeling something over 50 Chinese; that the number had risen as high as 90 in the city, but that generally there were something over 50. I was interested in that statement because there was a local count—taken through the police, undoubtedly, by a city official—and the number was so small that it could be ascertained with reasonable accuracy. I turned to the census, and the census said that there were 56 Chinamen in the entire State of West Virginia, and that in the entire county in which Wheeling is situated there were 8. I could not find figures for Wheeling alone, but in the county in which Wheeling is situated the census says there were 8 Chinamen, while the people who lived there and had occasion to count them say there are always over 50 and sometimes as many as 90.

There is a considerable percentage of error in that census return, and there is no reason to suppose that the same error may not have gone into other places where concealment is even more easy. I do not blame the Census Office. It is very hard to take a census of a people who do not want to be taken, and there is nothing easier than to fail. It is very difficult to take a thorough census of an unwilling people. It failed in the case of the blacks and there were gross errors in that case. I have no doubt there are errors in regard to the Chinese and that there are a great many more Chinese in the United States than are given in the census.

I do not, however, personally think it affects the argument one way or the other whether there are more or less. I do not think that it affects the argument on this bill in the least. We know that we purpose to prohibit the coming of Chinese labor and we know that it is trying to come in fraudulent ways.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. While that is true, it would be interesting to know upon what the Senator bases his confident prediction that we are face to face with an immigration of a million of those people.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say we were face to face with an immigration of a million of those people. I never said anything resembling it. What I said was that if you simply said in the law that every Chinaman calling himself a merchant or a teacher or a student is to be admitted and you apply no test to them, you would have a million Chinese laborers in this country in a very few years. But I do not suppose that anyone thinks of doing that. I have not yet heard a Senator rise here and say that he was against the exclusion of Chinese labor. On the contrary, my friend from Iowa took great pains to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from the imputation that he was not in favor of these laws. Therefore I suppose we are all for them. My argument is simply this: That if we are to prohibit Chinese labor, and it is the policy of this country to prohibit its coming in here, we want to do it intelligently and efficiently, with justice to them and with justice to ourselves.

Mr. President, I alluded to the census argument simply because I do not think the figures are in such condition as to sustain very securely any argument. I think even if the census figures were absolutely accurate in regard to the Chinese it would not affect the argument upon this bill at all, and I do not wish, therefore, to waste time upon it. The real point at issue is how we shall carry out the settled policy of the United States to exclude Chinese labor. I think that to merely continue the existing law is an imperfect method of carrying it out, and that the present bill as reported from the committee, with modifications such as I have suggested, and possibly others, is the better and the more intelligent way of doing it. We are going to meet a bill from the House, which lies on our table now, far more drastic than anything which has come out of our committee. We are going to be met with that bill in conference; and if Senators imagine that the House is going to throw away their entire bill and take a totally different one from us, they are more sanguine as to the yielding spirit of that body than I am.

I think we shall have to meet in conference the proposition to codify and rearrange existing law. We have done something in that direction in our committee. I hope we shall perfect the bill still more in the Senate, but I want to see the Senate meet the House with a reasonable proposition for the modification of the bill which they will bring us. You can not turn down that bill by merely declaiming against it; you have got to meet it. You will be compelled, in my judgment, to compromise with it, and I want to secure as a result the best legislation we can get. If this bill does not pass as it comes from the committee, modified as I have suggested; if it can not pass as I hope it will pass, because I think it is better legislation than the other; if the Senate sees fit to substitute the bill of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I shall then vote for that bill on its passage. If I can not get the best, I will take the next best. I merely want to get the best and most intelligent legislation that can be had. I think it is a practical question of legislation which we are called upon to decide, and not a question of sentiment. I believe in the exclusion of Chinese labor: I am committed to that policy as absolutely as a man can be. What is before us now for decision is a difference in detail, not a difference in principle, for I do not understand that any of us differ as to the principle.

I should like to call the attention of the Senate, in conclusion—for I have occupied far more time than I intended—to what I think is really at stake here. Let us face the real reasons for excluding Chinese. We are not going to exclude the Chinese because they are immoral. The Chinese have their virtues, and they have their vices. So have all the races of the world. Their virtues may differ from ours, and their vices may differ from ours; but it does not follow that their vices are, therefore, worse or that their virtues are less to be respected. There is plenty of immigration which comes to these shores with morals quite as bad as those of the Chinese, and I am not seeking to legislate against the latter because I think they are immoral. They are a quiet and a thrifty people wherever they live. You do not find their names on the criminal records very much. They are honest in business, and they attend to their business. I have not attacked the Chinamen or the Chinese Empire, and I have no desire to do so. I hope, as we all must hope, that the day will come when the Chinese Empire will be Christianized and will accept the great faith which we call our own. Yet I would not exclude them now on account of their religion, nor have I anything to say against them on that account. The reasons we select them for exclusion from the United States are two, and I think, Mr. President, they are absolutely unanswerable.

The first reason is that they are members not of a new and malleable race who can come here and adopt our methods and imbibed our ideas. They are members of an old and immutable civilization. They never can form a part of the body of American citizenship. They do not wish to do so. They would not do so if they could. They come here simply for profit. A great race which means to do that and nothing else in the United States is better outside the line than inside.

There is one other reason for Chinese exclusion which weighs with me with equal force, and I think it is what controls the people of this country in the policy which they have adopted. Let me first, before I state that second reason, call attention to the general immigration argument.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] said the other day that worse men came over the border of the Atlantic coast than ever came in from China on the Pacific coast. He said we needed some restrictive laws for immigration generally, and I agree with him. I sought to get improved restrictive legislation here, and a bill bearing my name was carried through both Houses and vetoed by President Cleveland. Another bill passed the Senate to the same effect, but was lost in the other House. I think nothing is more important than additional restriction of immigration coming from eastern Europe now pouring in and taking the place of the races that have made and built up the United States. But, Mr. President, because we have not got suitable immigration legislation on the Atlantic coast is no reason why we should deny it elsewhere. I, at least, can not legislate in that way. It is no argument to say because we fail in one place that we should not succeed in another. If I can not get good legislation for Atlantic-coast immigration, I will try to get good legislation to exclude what I think is a damaging immigration which comes into our Western ports.

The true arguments against the Chinese rests, first, as I have said, on the ground that they never can become a part of our citizenship, and, second, on the ground, as I feel it most strongly, that the Chinaman presents a form of economic competition which we can not meet. Under conditions which he can create he can survive and we can not survive.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator has done me the honor to refer to an observation I made, I want to say to the Senator that I had hoped that I had made my position so clear that I could not possibly be misunderstood, as being absolutely opposed to Chinese immigration so far as laborers are concerned.

Mr. LODGE. If I gave any impression to the contrary I beg the Senator's pardon. Nothing was further from my mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will read his remarks in the RECORD to-morrow morning, he will see, I think, that they bear the interpretation I have suggested. I simply want to say that my objections to the pending bill were on different lines altogether, while agreeing with the Senator absolutely so far as the restriction of Chinese labor is concerned.

Mr. LODGE. I know the Senator introduced it only by way of contrast.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was all.

Mr. LODGE. I know he said, in so many words, that he was in favor of excluding Chinese labor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On that point I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he knows of a single Senator in the Chamber who is in favor of the admission of Chinese laborers? It is admitted that they are all in favor of the exclusion of Chinese from competition with American workingmen.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has only come into the Chamber recently, otherwise he would have known that I have said, and if I have said it once, I have said it to the point of wearisomeness of repetition, that every Senator was in favor of the exclusion of Chinese laborers. I certainly never meant to suggest that any Senator was not.

But I wish to conclude what I was saying. Before I leave this subject I wish to define my own feelings in regard to the admission of Chinese labor, why I have always been opposed to it, why I am opposed to it now, and why I think we ought to have thorough, straightforward, honest, and effective legislation in regard to it.

As I was stating when interrupted, I am in favor of Chinese exclusion, because the Chinese can create economic conditions in which we can not survive. It is not the question of the fittest surviving, but a question of the survival of the fittest to survive. The best do not necessarily survive, and here we have a people 450,000,000 strong, who can produce an environment and a standard under which we can not live. Every people which has been actually threatened with serious Chinese immigration has shut or tried to shut the door against them. Australia will not let them in, and the Australians are people of our own kin and blood. Canada is agitating very wisely, as I think, to shut them out with a capitation tax which amounts to absolute exclusion. The Filipinos, as I said in the first part of my speech, regard the Chinese with a shuddering dread. In the history of the Philippine Islands there have been three or four massacres of all the Chinamen there by the native people rising against them. You may say that it is brutal, that it is horrible, but men become brutal when they are fighting for existence. You bring on the question of living between one man and another or one race and another and the primitive passion is going to come to the surface; you can not shut it down; and you can not put it aside by saying that it is brutal. When the Chinese in large numbers got into the Philippine Archipelago and drove the Filipinos out of employment and out of labor and threatened them with starvation, the Filipinos turned on them in a way a comparatively primitive people would turn on them—they turned on them and killed them.

Mr. President, when the Chinese came into this country there were outbreaks against them, which we all deeply regretted. Chinamen were killed at various points in this country. One of the objects this treaty sets forth is to prevent the recurrence of such deeds as that. I do not desire, for my part, that a people should come into this country against whom there rises up an instinctive hostility in the minds of large masses of our people. Let us, in the name of humanity and mercy, keep the races apart and shut out people who will excite such feelings. Let us keep such people from landing here.

One of my earliest remembrances, before I had taken the slightest interest in public questions, long before there was Chinese legislation, was an attempt to fill a great shoe factory at North Adams, in my State, with Chinamen in order to replace the white workmen who had struck for higher wages. I can still remember the impression that was made upon the community of Massachusetts. I can still remember the trouble that arose, the violence that occurred, and the feeling of relief that passed over the State when the whole thing ended. All this is the instinctive hostility of two races who can not meet on a common ground, economically speaking.

The Chinese are of the great Mongol family. We are of the Aryan race. Whether these Aryans came originally from the Pamirs in India or whether, as the more recent theory is, they poured down from the north of Europe into the south of Europe and thence east into Asia, it matters not. We are of that Aryan race, with a different language, a different past, a different hope, and a different future. There is the Mongol race; and when Chinese labor is brought into competition with our labor our labor can not meet it on the standard and in the environment that the Chinaman creates and live. That is why, as I believe, the great mass of American people, with a strong race instinct, with an instinct which can not be overcome, believes they should be shut out. I think that deep popular instinct is sound and wise. It is very easy to say, as is said constantly, "Oh, you are a friend of Denis Kearney; this comes up from the sand lot; it is the work of labor agitators," and all that sort of thing.

Mr. President, upon any great popular movement or upon a great popular desire the agitator and the demagogue are sure to fasten and seek their own profits, for the moment at least. But, Mr. President, if Senators think that the feeling or that the movement behind this legislation are only the work of the professional agitator or the sand-lot orator, they make, in my judgment, a very great mistake. I have the profoundest sympathy with this feeling myself. I think this is a question of dealing with a people utterly alien to us, who never can become a part of our civilization, who present economic conditions which we can not meet, and in the presence of whose labor our labor would perish.

We have wisely decided in the last twenty years to adopt the policy of exclusion. On that principle we are all agreed, and we are differing here now simply on details as to how to carry the principle into execution. All I hope and all I ask is that we should deal with this question with the feeling that this is no place for party lines or personal divisions of any kind, and that we may seek to get out of our discussion the best, the most intelligent, and the most efficient legislation that we as a legislative body are capable of giving to the country.

I think this is a great and important work, and I hope that the Senate will take up and consider and perfect, so far as they can, the bill of the committee. I also believe that it will be a great mistake to throw this measure aside, to avoid this question now, and pass a temporary bill to extend a loose, irregular system for two years, in order to be confronted, as we shall be, with this same question on the eve of a Presidential election, a time when

I do not think, to put it mildly, that the Chinaman would meet with any more consideration or justice than he will meet now. Possibly he would not meet with so much. I think it is better for the Chinaman, better for our commercial relations, better for our standing in every way, to take this subject up deliberately, make the best bill of this we now can, then consider it in conference with the other House, and put it on the statute book before the 5th day of May.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Mr. President, I receive now and then letters and telegrams directed to me as President pro tempore of the Senate, with the expectation on the part of the writers and senders that, as President of the Senate, I will communicate them to the body. I do not feel at liberty to do that, but as a Senator I do feel at liberty, and will take this opportunity to read two or three telegrams I received this morning on this subject. If the Senators from California are present they will notice these communications are from leading business men on the Pacific coast.

One of the most important business men on the Pacific coast.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are those dispatches from San Francisco?

Mr. FRYE. They are from San Francisco. I received a letter this morning, which I desire to read to the Senate because it relates to one provision liable to be in this bill in which I take a greater interest than in any other, and which is in danger of becoming a law, whatever the Senate of the United States does, through a conference report, the resistance to a conference report being very much more difficult than resistance to a proposition pending before either body.

Before this debate is over I may have a few words to say in relation to a very extraordinary and somewhat spectacular performance a few days since between the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] relating to the employment of seamen on the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator from Maine—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FRYE. I do not propose to do it now, but later on I will give the Senator from Indiana ample opportunity to reply.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was not aware of any spectacular performance, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. I said it seemed to me spectacular.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It seemed only so to the Senator from Maine, then, I think.

Mr. FRYE. I doubt it; I think it struck quite a number of other Senators in the same way.

The following letter is from the Boston Steamship Company:
BOSTON, April 10, 1902.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Having heard to-day of the amendment to the general Chinese-exclusion bill offered by Mr. CLARK, and which passed the House (which if it should become a law would be very disastrous to American vessels engaged in the Orient and Manila business from the Pacific coast), and feeling this is of great importance to American shipping, I took the liberty of sending you the following:

"Great injury will be done United States vessel owners if Clark amendment is passed in Senate, not only to vessels now running to Orient from Pacific, but to new proposed lines if subsidy bill passes. This business growing and should not be hampered."

You are probably aware that a very large percentage of the Orient and Manila business from the Pacific coast is now carried on by vessels under foreign flags, and you will readily see what a handicap it would be to the American flag if the amendment should pass.

One of my companies now has three steamers on the Pacific coast, and the first of the large new ships of this company sails the latter part of this month for that coast. It is far from encouraging to us, who are investing our money to build up the merchant marine, to find such legislation against the interests of American shipowners being suggested at Washington.

I am sorry to cause you any trouble in this matter, but felt that it was of such great importance that I must do so.

Yours, truly,

ALFRED WINSOR, President.

I simply desired to read these, without entering into the debate at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as bearing upon the subject of the propriety or advisability of simply extending the Geary Act—because that is the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]—and in answer to some of the dispatches which have been read here, I desire to place the author of the Geary Act on the witness stand—Hon. Thomas J. Geary, the man who was the author of the legislation which it is proposed to extend, an old-time citizen of California, a former Representative from that State in the House of Representatives, who inaugurated this scheme of legislation, and a man who, I presume, knows as much as any other man in the city of San Francisco or on the Pacific coast in regard to the workings of the law which bears his name. I ask the Secretary to read what he says about the propriety of extending the Geary Act in a telegraphic dispatch which came to me unsolicited the night before last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 10, 1902.

Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In view of the present conditions and experiences of the past ten years, nothing short of the Senate bill No. 2960 as reported will effectually exclude Chinese laborers and protect the American against such competition. The American seaman is equally entitled to protection against alien rivals as the builder or owner of the ship. I hope that the protest of the few selfish employers on this coast, who do not represent its sentiment, or the impertinent threat of a foreign minister will not influence the Senate to forget its duty to the American laborer.

T. J. GEARY.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in reference to one remark in that dispatch, wherein Mr. Geary refers to interference by a foreign minister, I desire to turn for a moment to the colloquy that took place a day or two since between the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and myself in reference to the communication sent by his excellency the Chinese minister, Wu Ting-fang, to the Secretary of State, with a special request that it be communicated to Congress. I inquired at the time of the Senator from New Hampshire what he thought of the propriety of the Chinese minister to the United States attempting thus directly to influence legislation in which his Government was concerned. The Senator said he saw no impropriety in it, and if there was any it was upon the part of the Secretary of State. The Senator from Ohio came to his relief with a statement that the Chinese minister had a perfect right to do what he did by virtue of a provision of the treaty. The Senator from Ohio is clearly in error, as it seems to me. There is nothing whatever in the treaty of 1894 upon the subject. There is a provision in the treaty of 1880, which I shall read. It is as follows:

"The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him."

That, Mr. President, does not authorize the Chinese minister to send in a communication to Congress, either through the Secretary of State or any other officer, as I believe, and I think his doing so was a gross violation of his privileges as minister to this country. It is my private opinion, Mr. President, that if such a thing had been done by the ambassador from England, or the ambassador from France, or the ambassador from Spain, or the ambassador from Italy, he would have received his passport inside of twenty-four hours.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Oregon understand that it is a breach of propriety for a government having a treaty with our Government, whereby either may call to the attention of the other what it believes to be an injustice in the working of an existing law, or the liability of a proposed law to work injustice, to send a communication to the Department of State with a request that it be laid before that department of the Government having authority on the subject?

That is, as I understand it, a provision of the treaty, that either party may call to the attention of the other any matter relating to legislation on a grave subject affecting both; and the treaty, it is true, goes beyond that, and says something else, which is that the two diplomatic authorities will discuss it together. The Chinese minister having that permission or agreement that the matter may be reconsidered by the two Governments, sent his views to the Secretary of State, and said, "Be good enough to make the department of your Government having legislative authority on this subject acquainted with our views." With great respect for the intelligence and knowledge of such things of my honorable friend from Oregon, the idea of finding an impropriety in that does not impress itself upon me as being very serious.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Massachusetts believe or hold to the doctrine that an ambassador of a foreign country or a minister of a foreign country, as in this case, has a right, within the lines of propriety and comity and the rights of ambassadors and ministers, to take up a piece of legislation reported from a committee of one of the Houses of Congress and discuss it and criticize it from one end to the other, as this minister has done, and have that communication sent to the Congress of the United States with a view of influencing Congress in dealing with the question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think so. We just differ.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If Great Britain had pending in Parliament legislation affecting American travelers or American seamen, describing them by nationality and race, I should think it entirely proper for Mr. Choate, under the direction of our Government or in proper cases on his own motion, to call the attention of the foreign office to such suggestions as occurred to him in behalf of American interests on that subject, with the respectful request that he lay those suggestions before Parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the exception of the last clause in the Senator's statement, I agree entirely with him. I have no doubt at all of the propriety of a foreign ambassador or minister communicating with the Secretary of State and pointing out what he may deem as something improper either in an existing treaty or in an existing law affecting an existing treaty, and then I have no doubt the Secretary of State has the right, through the President, to communicate with Congress. But what I object to is that the foreign minister takes up this piece of legislation and finds fault with it and criticizes it from one end to the other and asks that the communication be brought before Congress for the purpose of influencing legislation. That is something I do not think he ought to do within the lines of propriety.

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask my honorable friend if there is any earthly purpose of making the communication, which he says is proper, except that it may be laid before the lawmaking power of the Government? The Department has no control over legislation. It has no power over it. The Secretary of State has none. Now, therefore, if it is proper to communicate to him these reasons, it is certainly done for the sole and only purpose that they shall be communicated to Congress. You simply can not question that. Probably the Senator's complaint is simply that the minister put in words what everybody would know, that if such communication was made it was intended that it should be sent to Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a proper way of communicating with Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I understand.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is through the President.

Mr. HOAR. I know, and there is a proper way to communicate with the President, and that is through the Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. That is what the Chinese minister did.

Mr. MITCHELL. I find no fault with the Chinese minister for communicating with the Secretary of State, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the trouble with my honorable friend, in all candor, not so much the way he did it, but the power with which he did it, and the difficulty of answering his argument?

Mr. MITCHELL. This provision of the treaty, the Senator will see, simply authorizes him, after Congress has enacted legislation, to communicate with the Secretary of State if he finds fault with what Congress has done. That is all. I do not think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, by the way, can point to a single case in the history of this Government where a foreign minister has communicated to Congress in criticism of a piece of legislation pending before Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Did not foreign governments, not only their ministers, but several of the governments, express their sense of the impropriety of provisions in the Dingley bill while it was pending and have them communicated to Congress for its consideration?

Mr. LODGE. I think foreign ministers have an unquestioned right to communicate to the Secretary of State and to have their communications laid before Congress, but I should like to know, as the authorities are now settling that point, whether the minister of a foreign power has a right to come into a committee room and discuss pending legislation, because if that is all right, then the Chinese minister, when he did it last year or a year or two ago in the Foreign Relations Committee, was perfectly justified in coming and seeing Senator Davis and myself in regard to it. I do not think he was.

Mr. GALLINGER. He did not do it this year.

Mr. LODGE. No; but he has done it. Perhaps he has been warned off.

Mr. HOAR. The question whether that is proper is a question for the committee. I suppose they will settle it in their own way. I do not want to have the Senate diverted from this particular point by another one just now.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for making the answer which I would have tried to make, although I could not have made it so ably and completely as he made it, to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. When the colloquy which the Senator from Oregon refers to occurred in the Senate a few days ago I had no idea that anything was being said that anyone would take to heart or about which there would be really any difference of opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not taken anything to heart, so far as I am concerned. I merely referred to it as the Senator spoke of it in his speech.

Mr. FORAKER. But when a Senator refers to it and comments upon it in the spirited and zealous way in which the Senator from Oregon did just now it would seem that it had made a pretty firm lodgment in his mind, anyway. But, however that may be, the remark I made at the time of that colloquy was that according to my understanding of the matter then referred to the Chinese minister had a perfect right to do what the Senator from New Hampshire had shown he had done in sending to the Secretary of State a communication, which is to be found in the RECORD as a part of the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire.

What was it the Chinese minister did, and what was it that the treaty provided, to which I made reference—for the only part I took in that colloquy was to call attention to the fact that by our treaty stipulations with China it is provided that the Chinese minister representing China at this capital shall have a right to confer with the Secretary of State in regard to matters arising under our treaty provisions.

Mr. SPOONER. That would include writing?

Mr. FORAKER. That certainly would include writing.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if that would not have been the rule without its being in the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would have been the rule without its being there.

Mr. TELLER. But that is not the question the Senator from Oregon has been discussing.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand it to be. The Senator from Oregon was taking exception to what I said in connection with that colloquy. What I said, in addition to what the Senator from New Hampshire said, which was to the effect suggested by the Senator from Colorado, was that he had a right as a minister to make that communication. He had also a right specifically conferred upon him by the provisions of the treaty. Here is what I referred to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I did not mean to say he had a right to address a letter on this subject. He had a right to address a letter concerning legislation that we had enacted.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I mean.

Mr. TELLER. That is what he had a right to do, and that he had a right to do without the treaty, but not legislation that we are enacting. He has no right to do it, nor has the Secretary of State.

Mr. FORAKER. Let us see whether or not he has a right to do it. I agree absolutely with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as I understand his statement, that it is within the right of a minister representing a country at a foreign capital to confer with the proper officers of the government to which he is accredited with respect to contemplated legislation that will be objectionable to his country—to do it, of course, in a proper way, in a proper spirit, by a proper communication, and for a proper purpose, and that is all that the Chinese minister has done in this instance. He is pointing out, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests to me, in this communication to our Secretary of State, that the proposed legislation will not only be objectionable because of its provisions upon their merits, but that that legislation will be in violation of treaty rights.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the letter contains a threat—two of them.

Mr. FORAKER. Let us see whether it contains a threat or not. By article 4, which is still in force, of the treaty of 1880, it is provided as I shall read.

Now, in order that we may understand the scope of this specific authority to the Chinese minister, it is well enough to bear in mind that the treaty of 1880 was had at our solicitation; that it was entered into for the purpose of modifying the provisions of the treaty of 1868, simply a treaty negotiating additional articles to the treaty of 1858, which is the treaty that is in force between China and the United States to-day.

By the treaty of 1868 everybody could come from China to the United States who wanted to come, just as persons from other countries with which we had treaties of peace and amity. By the treaty of 1880, however, it was provided that we might regulate, limit, or suspend, and we promptly proceeded to suspend absolutely, although the treaty itself said while we had the right to suspend we should not absolutely prohibit even Chinese laborers.

Now, then, in view of the fact that it was within the contemplation of the parties that there should be legislation of a modifying character with respect to Chinese immigration, it was foreseen that there might be hardships imposed in connection with the enactment and enforcement of such legislation, and therefore it was provided as follows:

The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States—

Mr. MITCHELL. Legislation already had.

Mr. FORAKER (reading)—

who will consider the subject with him—

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER (reading)—

and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Peking and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

Mr. President, following the adoption of that treaty, legislation was enacted suspending the right of immigration, and then all the other legislation followed which has been commented upon in the course of this debate and on which I expect to comment in detail and at length on Monday next. But finally—

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question right here?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not much better, much more convenient, more agreeable to both parties that the difficulties should be stated before the legislation is had than afterwards?

Mr. FORAKER. Unquestionably; and I want to point out that the Chinese minister proceeds upon that theory, and in a communication of most respectful and polite character he presents his views upon it. I not only think he had a right to do it, but I think it was his duty to do it, and I think he would have been derelict as the representative of his country at this capital accredited if he had not done so, entertaining those views.

Here now, Mr. President, is what he says. This is not addressed to the Congress of the United States. It is addressed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, with whom, according to the provisions of our treaty, he was specifically authorized to confer whenever, in his judgment, it was proper that he should do so.

No. 240.] CHINESE LEGATION, Washington, March 22, 1902.

SIR: When the Chinese Government consented in 1880 to a modification of the treaty of 1868, whereby the free immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States was restricted, it was provided in the treaty that where the legislation of Congress authorized by that convention was likely to work hardships on the Chinese subjects the minister in Washington would be permitted to communicate with the Secretary of State, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit might result.

In making use at this time of the privilege granted in the cited treaty provision, I desire not to be understood as antagonizing the just provisions of pending legislation or influencing Congressional action, but to bring to your attention, and through you to Congress, some of the hardships which will inevitably result to the subjects of China in case some of the proposed legislation should become a law. Should I remain silent until the bills now before Congress be enacted into a law, it will then be too late to remedy the evil. I trust, therefore, that what I say to you may aid the honorable Congress in making a right conclusion on the subject.

Then he goes on to discuss the very objections that he, as the representative of the Chinese people, has to the legislation that is proposed, all of it in a perfectly respectful way. I do not propose at this time to read that. It is not necessary to insert it because it is in the RECORD as a part of the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. But what I call attention to is that the communication was to the Secretary of State, with him, and to him, and nobody else.

That the communication has found its way into Congress and into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is something that the Chinese minister is not responsible for, except only in the sense that he is the author of the communication. Evidently Mr. Hay, the Secretary of State, did not think there was any impropriety in the Chinese minister sending him that communication, or that he had transgressed the privileges accorded to him in the treaty stipulations to which I have referred.

I did not know until this moment just how the communication got here, but I am informed by Senators sitting near me that the Secretary of State, thinking it entirely proper that he should do so in the discharge of his duty, sent it to the committee in the Senate having this legislation under consideration, and in that way it has come to be a public document. What I want to call attention to is that it was within the right and privilege of the representative of the Chinese Empire to make this communication without regard to the treaty. But the right and power to do it is emphasized by the treaty stipulation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had supposed until this moment that the communication had been sent as an official communication to the President of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I infer from the colloquy which has just taken place between the Senators in front of me that it was sent informally to the Committee on Immigration. Is that it?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply want to ascertain the fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator misunderstood a whispered suggestion I made to him. As I understand the matter, it was transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President pro tempore of the Senate, and by order of the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MITCHELL. If that is the fact, very well. I did not know what the fact was.

Mr. FORAKER. It was not the Chinese minister who sent it to this body or the other House, but it was our own official, the Secretary of State, to whom with propriety the Chinese minister had sent the communication.

I wish to call attention to the character of it, the fact that the Chinese minister, in sending it, plants himself upon his right under the treaty. Suppose he made a mistake about it? Suppose he is in error in so construing that provision? Is he to be condemned as having done something on account of which he should be given his passports, as was remarked here a moment ago? It seems to me that the zeal of those who want to condemn anything and everything connected with China, or likely to come to this country from China, has outstepped itself when Senators undertake to criticize in the manner in which this has been criticised a communication of this character. That is all I believe I care to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I propose to make a single observation and not to detain the Senate more than a moment. I took occasion, when the matter which has been revived to-day by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] was under discussion, to say that I was of opinion that no impropriety on the part of the Chinese minister could properly be charged; that the communication came through the State Department, and that we could not look beyond that. The document is here; it is open to the examination of every Senator, and I am very glad that I took occasion to put it into the RECORD, where some people in the country at least may read it.

I rose, however, to make a single remark concerning the telegram which the Senator from Oregon had read from the author of the so-called Geary law. That telegram, in its first sentence, is in these words:

In view of the present conditions and experiences of the past ten years, nothing short of the Senate bill No. 2900, as reported, will effectually exclude Chinese laborers and protect the American against such competition.

In the remarks I had the honor to make a few days ago I made this statement, which is according to the statistics furnished by the Director of the Census for the year 1900:

In 1890 there were 72,472 Chinese in California, while in 1900 there were only 45,753, a decrease of nearly 40 per cent in a single decade.

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what the present conditions are or what the experiences have been that are alarming Mr. Geary at the present time? In the State of California, where he lives, in the past ten years—and that is the period to which he alludes—there has been a decrease of 40 per cent. In other words, a decrease from 72,472 in 1890 to 45,753 in 1900.

Can the Senator explain to my benighted understanding what it is that Mr. Geary is so alarmed over and what the conditions are that makes it necessary for us to legislate more drastically and more offensively to the Chinese than we did when the Geary law was passed?

Mr. MITCHELL. We are not trying, in my judgment, to legislate either more drastically or more offensively.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL. My judgment about the bill is simply this, in brief: That it is a codification of the existing laws, incorporating into the bill all those principles which have been definitely settled by decisions of the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, and the Federal courts. I do not believe the pending bill is any more drastic than the existing law, when you view the existing law in the light of these decisions to which I have referred. That is my honest opinion about it.

There are a good many reasons for their codification. To know exactly what the law is now you have first to look into the treaty of 1894, then the treaty of 1890, and then the act of 1888, which, by the way, never materialized, in the opinion of many, because based on a treaty never ratified by China. In the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury, I believe, that act is, in part, in force to-day. You are compelled, then, to look into the act of 1892 and the act of 1893, which is amendatory of the act of 1892, and then you have to consider the various questions that have been settled by adjudication by the Treasury Department, by the Department of Justice, and by the decisions of the Federal courts.

That is the one great reason why the legislation proposed by the committee is preferable to a simple extension of existing law. It would be a peculiar piece of legislation on our statute books if the bill proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] should be passed. The act of 1892, which is the Geary Act, was simply an extension of existing legislation, a kind of a drag net to drag along and keep in operation the act of 1888 and other acts then in existence. Then that was amended by the act of 1893. Then comes along the treaty of 1894. Now you propose to hitch on again by a legislative hook this act of 1892, and by a few lines to say that all existing legislation is continued in force. It is bad legislation to start with. The Senator from Connecticut will admit that, I think.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am—

Mr. SPOONER. Disappointed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am disappointed. I regret to hear him say it. If his amendment should be passed, I venture to say the Senator from Connecticut can not point to a single piece of legislation like it on the statute books of this country since the beginning of the Government—not one. There may be several cases where there have been acts passed simply extending existing legislation. I doubt whether there ever was a case where, after a period of ten years had elapsed, under an act extending the operation of several acts, there has been a proposition to extend again the whole thing by a few lines extending existing legislation. It is bad legislation.

Now, in regard to the question asked by the Senator from New Hampshire, I think if he had read as carefully as I have read every word of the 580 pages of testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Immigration he would not ask the question. He would find in the evidence taken there a full, sufficient, and complete answer to the question.

Now, one other word, Mr. President, as long as I am up. What is the situation? What is the purpose upon the part of the two Houses of Congress in having committees? It is for the purpose of taking up bills and perfecting them and determining as to the character of legislation that ought to be enacted. Take this case.

Here were five or six bills introduced at the beginning of the session on the theory suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. One was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], one by Senator PROCTOR, and one was introduced by myself, although mine went much further, because it had certain provisions condensing the law and bringing it up, besides extending the principle of exclusion to our insular possessions, but in a measure it was the same kind of legislation, and, as I now think after thorough consideration, a very bad bill. This committee took the subject up deliberately. It is one of the great committees of the Senate, composed of the ablest men we have here, good lawyers, able men, faithful Senators. They went about an investigation. They investigated and they took, as I said, 580 pages of closely written testimony. They went into the whole case thoroughly, and that committee come here and with one exception (I think the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is perhaps the only dissenter in the committee) they report this bill to us.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand the Senator, it does not change the existing law at all, but is a mere codification.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is my understanding of it that it does not change the existing law, construing the law as I have said, except the principle of exclusion is extended to our insular possessions.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it came pretty near falling within the Latin phrase, Parturiunt montes; nascitur ridiculus mus.

Mr. MITCHELL. That may be, as far as that is concerned.

Now, what is the Senate to do? Are those members of the Senate, who are not members of that committee, who have never had the opportunity, although just as capable as members of the committee to investigate this subject generally as are the members of the committee—why do you Senators want to rebuke this committee and present and pass a bill which that committee, the great body of it, I believe a majority of all, perhaps but one, think ought to be passed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. Furthermore, if I may without violating the rules—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, Mr. President; not just yet. After a little I will yield. I may say further—

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. If I may be permitted to do so without violating the rules—

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is violating the rules, inasmuch as I yielded to him to answer a question and he is making a speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no; I am not making a speech.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have the floor, Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask only a moment longer.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator asks me to yield to him I shall be glad to do it, but I will not admit that he has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, if I can do it without violating another rule which I have in my mind, that the distinguished Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, headed by Representative HITT, has reported a more drastic measure than this, I am advised.

Mr. CULLOM. I think not.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is wrong.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the committee modified it very much, but afterwards the House ran over the committee and made it a more drastic bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it was a very good bill as reported from the committee, and probably a little better bill after it had been doctored by the House. Now, then, I think we ought to do just what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said to-day. We ought to go on with this bill. If there is anything that is wrong about it let us amend it and fix it up and pass it. Time is passing, Mr. President. Unless we get legislation on this subject signed by the President of the United States before the 5th of next month, the doors are flung wide open and all the steamship companies in the country will be happy, because they will—

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that by unanimous consent we have to take a vote on this bill next Wednesday, I do not think the Senator's plea that time is passing has much potency.

The Senator from Oregon having disciplined the Chinese minister now proceeds to discipline the members of the Senate who do not chance to be members of the Committee on Immigration. I think we have an entire right to criticize the bill. I certainly am going to exercise that right to the fullest extent that I choose.

The Senator from Oregon suggests that all the members of that distinguished committee agreed to this bill except one; and yet when the Senator from Massachusetts ended his speech to-day I wondered whether he was for or against the measure, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, announced his willingness to have a portion of the bill stricken out. It strikes me that it was not a measure so well considered as it might have been by that very distinguished committee, and that it came here in a very crude shape. My judgment is that if this bill survives the ordeal through which it is to pass that the author of it, whether it be a Senator from the Pacific coast or Mr. Liver-nash, whoever he may be, who says he wrote it, will hardly be able to recognize the child of his creation. That is my judgment.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon, in the speech he made, did not answer my question. Evidently Mr. Geary had not been coached as to the attitude of the Senator from Oregon when he sent that telegram. Mr. Geary does not put his advocacy of the bill on the ground that he wants the law codified. He says nothing of the kind. He says he wants Senate bill 2960 enacted into law in view of the present conditions and experiences of the past ten years, so as to effectually exclude Chinese laborers and protect the Americans against such competition.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And nothing short of that will accomplish it.

Mr. GALLINGER. And nothing short of that will accomplish what he desires.

Now, Mr. President, I have asked the question several times in the Senate—and I think I am not violating confidence when I say I have asked it in the cloakroom—of Senators from the Pacific coast, and I have never yet received an answer. What on earth are you making this hullabaloo about anyway? The number of Chinese in California is 40 per cent less to-day than it was ten years ago, and yet they want to get rid of the Chinese. Unless they propose to absolutely drive them from California and drive them from this country why do they want any different legislation on the statute books from what we have at the present time? If some Senator from the Pacific coast interested in this bill, whether he was a partner in drafting it or not, will answer that simple question, I should like very much to give him all the remaining time that I may claim in this debate for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the State that I represent in part is a Pacific State, in part at least. A goodly portion of it lies on the Pacific slope. I will answer the Senator.

We want a law that will exclude the laboring Chinese from coming to this country. We have several statutes. We have a large number of regulations, and while some of the regulations have the force of statutes they are liable, with a change of Secretary of the Treasury, to be changed. We want a condition created by law that will in time rid the American continent of every Chinese laborer. We do not want one of them on the continent, and the sooner we get rid of them the better it will be for the American people.

Now, Mr. President, we believe that this proposed law is neither drastic, inhuman, or violative of any provision of the treaty. We believe that it is consistent with every idea of humanity, and we do not want every two years to go through a contest for the passage of a bill of this kind, as we must do if the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut prevails.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 11418) to increase the pension of Hannah T. Knowles; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HANNAH T. KNOWLES.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the resolution which has just come from the House of Representatives may be laid before the Senate. It is a short resolution recalling a bill from the President, and Monday is the last day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield for this purpose?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 11418) "An act to increase the pension of Hannah T. Knowles."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] read to the Senate quite a number of telegrams from distinguished citizens, he says, of California in which they speak of this bill in a severe manner. I will venture to say that they know nothing about the bill except the provision which excludes Chinese sailors from American ships. That is where their trouble comes in. They do not want that done, because it will lessen the profits of the shipowners. That is a separate proposition from the general provision of exclusion, but it falls within the principle that if we rightfully exclude Chinese from American soil we ought to exclude them from American ships.

Mr. President, I only want to say a word about the question of the interference of the Chinese minister. I have said nothing about it heretofore, but I want to say now that in my judgment, if any European minister had interfered with our affairs in the disagreeable and improper manner the Chinese minister has done for the last year, he would have been sent home long ago, and I am astonished that any Senator should stand in the Senate and say that it is the right of a foreign minister of any nationality whatever to give us advice as to what we shall do in a legislative way. I say it never has been done in the history of this country, and there is nothing in the treaty of 1880 which can be tortured into an excuse for doing it.

The treaty of 1880 simply provided that when we had enacted certain legislation, if it was not satisfactory to the Chinese Government they might confer with our Government with reference to another treaty, and that is all there is of it. I say no self-respecting nation has ever allowed, in the history of the world, a foreign minister to interfere in its affairs. What kind of a condition are we to be in, Mr. President, if, when we attempt legislation that the minister from Great Britain does not approve of, he can come here with his letters or even go to the State Department and enter his protest? Has such a thing ever been heard of? Never. The Senator from Wisconsin nods that it has. I challenge him to show that it has even been done except in an early day, and then it cost the minister his position here. He went home, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any danger in my accepting the challenge? I suppose not.

Mr. TELLER. I challenge the Senator to prove it. I do not expect to fight a duel with the Senator, but I want him to make good the proof if he means to assert that this has been done.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not furnish the proof at this moment, but I will furnish it. Unless I am very greatly mistaken in my memory there were communicated to the Senate, during the consideration of the Dingley bill, protests of foreign governments against certain of its provisions.

Mr. TELLER. If there were I did not know it. If there were, I venture to say it is a new precedent; it is this modern idea that we are not an independent sovereignty of our own.

Mr. SPOONER. That was not the Senator's challenge.

Mr. TELLER. But I doubt it, although I would not say it was not done, because I did not support the Dingley bill. I was not in the secrets of those who were passing it, and I have always been glad I did not support that measure.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Colorado will permit me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly I will.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator to say that the only privilege granted to the Chinese minister by the stipulation of the treaty of 1880 was to confer with the Secretary of State in reference to the negotiation of a new treaty.

Mr. TELLER. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not so understand it. Let me call the Senator's attention to the language of the treaty.

Mr. TELLER. Very well; read it.

Mr. FORAKER. I will not unduly interrupt the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I know that no one can make a speech here without being interrupted, and I am ready to be interrupted.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it adds to the elucidation of the proposition under consideration. I do not like these set speeches. I think we accomplish a great deal more by interrupting one another, if we do it in a respectful way, and by these colloquies than by coming here and listening to long set speeches.

Mr. TELLER. I did not mean to complain, and I have refused to be interrupted but once in my life that I recollect.

Mr. FORAKER. I know the Senator does not complain, and therefore I feel emboldened to interrupt him, but I never interrupt him except for the purpose of expediting the discussion and for legitimate purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Go ahead.

Mr. FORAKER. This is the language that is in the treaty, in Article IV:

If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him.

That says nothing about the negotiation of another treaty, but it refers to the hardships that have resulted from the legislation which was to be enacted to carry out the treaty.

Now, that is what the minister discusses in this letter. He points out what has been done under these regulations. It has been said here that those regulations are in accordance with the treaty. I want to say, and I think I can satisfactorily demonstrate to the satisfaction of any unbiased mind—and I will try to do it on Monday—that those of which we make complaint—not all of them, but some of them—are gross violations of the treaty. What the Chinese minister points out is the operation of the law as it is being administered under the regulations. He points out that they are not, in his opinion, in conformity with the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. TELLER. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has had his say. If it does not mean the negotiation of another treaty, it does not mean anything at all. The minister will confer with the Secretary. The Secretary could not set aside the statute. It must remain in force until a proper repeal, which could be done by another treaty I know.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I will yield again.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood it to mean that they would confer, the Secretary of State being the agency through which the Chinese minister would communicate to our Government, and that the Secretary of State would, upon hearing his complaints, if he thought they were well grounded, submit his views to Congress in order that these laws might be repealed, if they were in violation of the treaty or if hardships were being committed under them upon the Chinese.

Mr. TELLER. If it means that, which it does not—

Mr. FORAKER. And another reason why it could not have meant the treaty is that the treaty is perpetual except only as to its limitation.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, there never was any treaty that was perpetual.

Mr. FORAKER. I mean by its terms—

Mr. TELLER. It can be modified at any time.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly, by treaty.

Mr. TELLER. And no treaty in the world has ever been found to be perpetual, either.

Mr. President, it meant, if it meant anything at all, that the two Governments would consider whether there should not be a modification of it. The only way the Secretary could assist in the modification really was by a new treaty. If we had made a new treaty with the Chinese Government that we had accepted, it would repeal every provision of the statute inconsistent with the treaty. That is what it meant. But that it meant the other thing, that he was to submit it to us, that is not the condition. It referred to existing law. This proposition of the Chinese minister is now to interfere with an attempt to enact a law. I hope the Senate can see the distinction if the Senator from Ohio can not. What it might be proper for a minister to say as to a law already enacted would be exceedingly improper for him to say as to a proposed enactment that Congress was considering.

Mr. President, the Secretary of State and his officers have not any right to say to us that this proposed measure in the Senate or in the House is not a proper one. The President has not any such right. It is a breach of privilege of the body. The King of Great Britain has not that right and dare not exercise it. The President of the United States may send to us a treaty, advising us what kind of laws he thinks ought to be made for some particular emergency, I have no doubt, but he can not send a treaty here, without a gross violation of the rights of the legislative body, when we are enacting a law, and say, "That will not do; we have got to have a different law." Does anybody here who has any idea of the courtesies, of the decencies, of the proprieties of the right of the Senate suppose that that could be done? And, if our own officers can not do it, can a minister from Great Britain, or China, or anywhere else do it? Mr. President, the thing is absolutely absurd.

The only way to treat this subject, I suppose, is to assume that the Chinese minister did not know. What astonishes me is that the Secretary of State should have complied with his request and sent it here. I can see that there would have been no impropriety in the Secretary of State concurring with him, and there would be no impropriety if the committee wanted to send to the Secretary of State to confer with him as to a proposed law touching foreign affairs of this kind, if they see fit to do it. I do not believe that it would be a decent and proper thing for the committee to send for a foreign minister, nor do I believe he ought to be allowed to appear before any committee. It would be rather an unheard-of thing, I think, to send for the Secretary of State or the head of any other department of the Government except where there were intricacies and difficult things, like financial questions, when the Secretary of the Treasury is brought before the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator's reference to a minister coming before the committee is perhaps based upon the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I intended when I had the floor a few moments ago to say that I have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations ever since the session of the Congress which began March 4, 1897, and during all that time I have never heard of the Chinese minister or any other minister appearing before that committee. I have never heard of anybody connected with that committee taking the opinion of the Chinese minister or any other representative of a foreign government. I was quite surprised when the Senator made that statement. I do not know under what circumstances such a thing could have happened that I did not know something about it, for I have missed very few meetings of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I know nothing whatever about it, except what the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said. I have no doubt if the Chinese minister was there that he was probably invited to be there. I do not suppose that he would have attempted to attend without an invitation, and I do not suppose the committee would allow him to appear otherwise. But I would say that I regard it as an improper thing for a committee to confer either with a foreign minister or an accredited agent of a foreign government. That has been done by a committee at this session of Congress, but I deny the right of the agent of any foreign government to appear before a committee of this body. I know well that the committees have ample power to do almost anything, and that no one can call them to account for it. They may call before them, I suppose, anyone who can give them information. It is a question of propriety. But it is certainly contrary to the usual administration of public affairs for a foreign minister to interfere in any way with legislation, either in this country or in any other. I venture to say that if the American minister should attempt in the slightest degree to influence legislation in Great Britain he would have to come home by the next steamer. In my opinion, any self-respecting people will insist upon the enforcement of that rule.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, I only rise because of a remark made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] as to the position of members of the committee having this bill in charge with reference to the bill itself. He stated that he believed there was but one member of the committee who was not in favor of this bill. If he means by that that every other member of the committee is in favor of the bill in its entirety, I wish to dissent from that position. There are members of that committee now on this floor who will recollect distinctly that I, although I was then a new member of the Senate and a new member of the committee, objected to several of the provisions of the bill. I felt a great deal of delicacy in asserting myself because I was a new member, and because the testimony had about all been taken before I was put upon the committee and appeared at any of its meetings. Nevertheless, I did assert myself upon some of the provisions of the bill and particularly with reference to that provision which excludes the employment of Chinese laborers upon our vessels.

I have voted in the short time I have been a member of this body for a bill which I hope and believe will very much enlarge American shipping interests. I do not propose to be so inconsistent as to turn around and vote for a provision in another bill which will strike those interests down. If the testimony which was given before that committee can be relied upon, it seems to me evident that certain of our shipping interests will have to go from under the American flag if this bill passes with that provision in it.

I only want to make my position clear here, simply that I may not be considered inconsistent in any of the votes which I may choose to give upon the amendments pending to this bill or upon the bill itself, or if I should not vote in consonance with the position which the distinguished Senator from Oregon said he understood every member of the committee except one occupied with regard to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I shall be glad to rectify it if in any way, by imputation or otherwise, I have misrepresented the position of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN]. I did not mean by anything I said to convey the idea that all the members of the committee agreed to all the provisions of the pending bill, because it is evident that that is not the case. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said in open Senate to-day that he was utterly opposed to some of the provisions referred to by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this debate, but simply to say that, having listened to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], it seems to me that he presents unanswerable reasons why this bill should be referred back to the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, we have had read here telegraphic and other communications from shipping companies, from merchants, and from other people in high station relating to this bill. There have been handed to me resolutions passed by several bodies of seafaring men—one in New York, one in Philadelphia, and one in San Francisco—men who are striving to survive in this struggle which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] so eloquently and clearly described in his speech this morning. I should like to have the resolutions read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolutions referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas Senators HANNA and FRYE stated that the heat in the stokeholes of steamers trading to the Orient is such that no white stokers can endure the same; and

Whereas this statement appears to have been the cause of the Senate voting down the anti-Chinese amendment to the subsidy bill; and

Whereas this statement is without any foundation in fact, the truth being that white stokers go in the transports from this coast through the Suez, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean to the Philippines, and that white stokers go in steamers to the West Indies, Central and South America: Therefore,

Resolved by the Marine Firemen's Union of New York, in regular meeting assembled, That we repudiate the heat argument and the idea that it had any justification in any humanitarian concern for the health of the stokers or marine firemen; and further

Resolved, That we have been and are now willing to serve as stokers in those vessels, and will gladly do the work now done by the Chinese; and further

Resolved, That we hereby urge upon Congress to give to us, who go to sea, the same protection from Chinese competition that it shall be willing to give to workers on land.

JAMES W. BIRD,
Secretary A. C. M. F. U.
WILLIAM MACQUEEN,
Chairman.

Whereas during the subsidy debate and also during the hearings on the Chinese-exclusion bill it has been stated in Congress that white firemen for reasons of health can not be employed in the fire rooms of steamers trading in the Tropics; and

Whereas this statement is being used to deprive us of the protection against Chinese competition: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the Firemen's Union of Philadelphia, call attention to the fact that we sail in vessels on the Gulf coast to Central and South America and in any vessels anywhere so long as we are wanted and paid; and

Resolved, That in our opinion it is not a friendly act to deprive us of work and give it to the Chinese; and further

Resolved, That it would be more frank and friendly to state the reason why Chinese are carried, it being known of all seafaring men that the wages for Chinese are $9, while we, as American firemen, insist upon about four times that amount; and further

Resolved, That, being good enough to fight under the flag for its honor, we ought to be good enough to make a living under it.

Approved by regular meeting March 25, 1902.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Chairman.
HORACE ATKINSEN, Secretary.

Whereas the United States Senate in passing the ship-subsidy bill killed the seamen's amendment of said bill; and

Whereas in the argument which caused the elimination of said seamen's clause, the advocates of the subsidy bill stated that white men were unable to endure the heat of the Tropics; and

Whereas we, members of the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union, are now sailing in the ships of the Oceanic Company trading to Australia, in the United States Government transports running to Manila, and in the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's vessels trading to Panama, and are only too willing to accept employment in all vessels trading to any port on the Pacific: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union, That we denounce the statements made and the arguments set forth in the United States Senate as misleading and not based upon facts, and assert that they can only be ascribed to ignorance of the true condition of the manning of some of the trans-Pacific lines running out of San Francisco; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senators PATTERSON and PENROSE, Representative KAHN, and others.

PACIFIC COAST MARINE FIREMEN'S UNION,
Per JOHN BELL, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 27, 1902.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but if I may have the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] for a moment, I find that under date of May 19, 1897, the following communication was sent to the then Vice-President of the United States, Mr. Hobart, by the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 19, 1897.

SIR: Agreeably to the request of the German ambassador, I have the honor to lay before you, with a view to their presentation to the Senate, copies of the correspondence indicated below, in regard to the protest of the German Government against differential treatment of bountied sugars in the tariff bill at present under consideration in the Senate.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

HON. GARRET A. HOBART,
Vice-President of the United States, United States Senate.

Then follows a very elaborate communication from the German ambassador to the Secretary of State. The Dingley bill was then pending in the Senate. The ambassador in his communication to the Secretary of State said:

By instruction of the Imperial Government, I have the honor respectfully to invite your excellency's attention to the fact that this provision—

That was in regard to the sugar differential—can not be reconciled with the right of the most favored nation, which is granted by existing treaty stipulations to German products with respect to the duties to be imposed upon them on entry into the United States.

Of course I shall not take the time to read the entire communication. This communication was first presented to the Secretary of State, who sent it here, with a formal request that it be laid before the Senate.

There was also sent to the Senate under date of June 4, 1897, by the Secretary of State, this communication:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 4, 1897.

SIR: Agreeably to the request of the minister of Austria-Hungary, herewith transmitted, I have the honor to lay before you, with a view to its presentation to the Senate, a translation of a note containing the protest of the Government of Austria-Hungary against the proposed treatment of bountied sugars in the tariff bill at present under consideration in the Senate.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

HON. GARRET A. HOBART,

Vice-President of the United States.

Then there follows the protest and argument.

I am frank to say to the Senator, for I remember distinctly being in my seat at the time these communications were read to the Senate, that I did not like them. I only call attention to the matter.

Mr. TELLER. At that time I was not present in the Senate. The case cited by the Senator is a little different from the proceeding here. That was a governmental declaration, and it was from the Government of the country and not from its minister, as I understand.

Mr. SPOONER. The minister did this.

Mr. TELLER. But at the instigation of his Government.

Mr. SPOONER. And I presume the Chinese minister sent his communication at the instigation of his Government.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing in his communication to indicate that, and in fact the conditions in China are such that I do not think this man has any communication at all with his Government. There is a wide distinction between the government of one country appealing to the government of another and a minister who is accredited here doing so. I am not surprised that the Senator from Wisconsin did not like it; it ought to have been resented, and I presume it was resented in the legislation which was enacted, for I do not suppose the Senate paid the slightest attention to that communication.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care anything about it, but I do not see any distinction between the case of the Chinese minister and the other cases to which I have referred. It is a distinction without a difference, it seems to me. That was an argument, a protest, presented by the minister, and presented by instruction of his Government, to the Secretary of State, and he requested our Secretary of State to lay the communication before the Senate, which our Secretary of State proceeded to do, and the bill to which the communication referred was then pending and under consideration in the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, there is a vast distinction between the cases, but I want to insist now that the action of the Chinese minister was an interference not justified by the usual treatment by one nation of another. Such a communication should not have come here, and the Secretary of State, who did not dare himself to interfere, had no business to interfere in this way. I will not take back the assertion that a government can not maintain its dignity and legislate properly if it allows any other nation in the world to take a hand in its legislation; and then, if it fail to comply with the request, that that becomes an offense, for if other nations have a right to address us at all, it is because they have a right to influence our legislation. The thing is simply monstrous, it is simply horrible, though I admit that the Senator has found one precedent for it.

Mr. SPOONER. Two precedents.

Mr. TELLER. Two precedents; but at the same time that does not make the rule any better, and does not establish such a right.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I have finished.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I have the floor.

Mr. President, in answer to the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that there is a wide difference between the precedents cited by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the action of the Chinese minister which has been referred to, and the difference is, as he defines it, that the one did it by instruction of his Government, and the other without any such instruction, allow me to call the Senator's attention to what the Chinese minister says officially in his communication.

I have received repeated instructions from the Imperial Government, in view of the reenactment of the exclusion laws, to exert myself to see that treaty rights are observed and that no unnecessary hardships are placed upon Chinese subjects, and I feel that on account of the pendency of the legislation referred to I could not refrain from asking you to lay before the honorable Congress the views above set forth.

In other words, Mr. President, the Chinese minister in sending this communication regarded himself as complying with the instructions of his Government.

Mr. TELLER. He might have so regarded it, but he does not come here officially. He does not say so. That is an afterthought on his part; that is an excuse which he is making.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, how can it be said to be an afterthought or an excuse when it is embodied in this communication, when he says to our Secretary of State that he addresses him officially and under instructions of the Chinese Government, which he represents here? This is in strict accord with the two precedents cited by the Senator from Wisconsin. I venture to say it has been the uniform practice from the beginning of this Government down to this time for accredited representatives of nations to communicate with our Government in a proper way whenever anything was proposed that they saw fit to express themselves in regard to. I have never heard of that right being questioned until now; but as the Senator has given us a challenge, I will undertake to answer it on Monday with numerous precedents.

Mr. TELLER. Very well, Mr. President, if the Senator will do so, I hope he will distinguish between a minister filling the newspapers with his vaporings and writing letters to the Secretary of State asking them to be sent here, and the action of a government. The State Department could hardly reject a declaration coming from the ambassador of Great Britain if he said he spoke for his Government and by its direction. There has been no pretense until now that this man, who has been filling the newspapers with his complaints about this legislation, has been speaking for his Government. If he had been doing so it would have been just as wrong in my opinion, and I do not believe, either, that such has been the precedent.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the fact that we recognize him as minister from China is conclusive on us that he represents his Government. Now, when the Senator talks about the minister going into the newspapers, that is a different proposition.

Mr. TELLER. It is not conclusive that everything he says comes from his Government. If that is the fact we ought to have sent him home long ago.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have only one word to add, and that is, that this was not a vamping in a newspaper. I do not know to what the Senator from Colorado may refer in that connection. The Chinese minister may have expressed himself in interviews that have been published in the newspapers, and the Senator may have reference to those. If so, whenever they come properly before us, we will give consideration to them.

But now we are considering whether or not it was proper for the Chinese minister, acting under the direction of his Government, to communicate with this Government that recognizes him as the minister of that Government in the way in which he did communicate. Certainly there can be no exception taken to it, and there is no ground for criticism of it, except only, Mr. President, upon the same theory that this bill proceeds, in some respects, that a different rule is to be applied to China from the rule which is applied to any other country. As to no other country on the face of the earth with which we have treaty relations would we think of legislating in a way that did violence to treaty obligations, and if the representative of such a government were to make complaint to us that we were about to legislate in violation of a treaty nobody would think of making complaint of it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I wish to put on record my belief that it is the universal practice of all civilized governments who have diplomatic agents that when any legislation or other government action is proposed by one government which they think will be injurious to the citizens of the country which they represent to make known to the proper department of that government the facts which lead them to think it will be an injury. It is not only, in my belief, the existing custom acted upon by our ministers abroad, as well as by the ministers of other countries here, but it is a wise custom and constitutes one of the most valuable functions of a minister. It is not meddling with our affairs. It is letting us know facts in time for our consideration which we want to know, but which we might not know, and if it is done properly, through the regular diplomatic channel, it ought to be done.

I have no doubt that the lives of eminent diplomatists like Lord

Malmesbury, who was known better in diplomacy as Mr. Harris; and Canning, Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, and the eminent men who have represented Great Britain in the United States and those who have represented us in Great Britain, would demonstrate that it has been a uniform custom. If there was pending and likely to pass in the House of Commons an act which would operate harshly upon American sailors or American travelers, Mr. Choate would be derelict in his duty if he did not go in a quiet way to the foreign office and say, "This legislation which is proposed in your Parliament will have such and such an effect on American sailors and travelers."

Mr. SPOONER. And it is much better to do so beforehand.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; it is much better to do so beforehand than after the legislation. In that particular case I do not know what else may have happened; but, in my opinion, the Chinese minister acted with eminent wisdom and propriety.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PETRIFIED FOREST NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby reserved from settlement, entry, sale, or other disposal, and set apart as a public reservation, all those certain tracts, pieces, or parcels of land lying and being situate in the Territory of Arizona and particularly described as follows:

Townships 16 and 17 north, ranges 23 and 24 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, Arizona.

Sec. 2. That said public park shall be known as The Petrified Forest National Park, and shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to prescribe such rules and regulations and establish such service as he may deem necessary for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide specially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of the mineralized or fossilized formations or deposits, natural curiosities, and wonders within said park.

Sec. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in the exercise of his discretion, to rent or lease, under rules and regulations to be made by him, pieces or parcels of ground within said park for the erection of such buildings as may be required for the accommodation of visitors.

Sec. 4. That all funds arising from the privileges granted hereunder shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a special fund, to be expended in the care of said park.

Sec. 5. That all persons who shall unlawfully intrude upon said park, or who shall, without permission, appropriate, injure, or destroy any of the mineralized or fossilized formations or deposits found therein, or other natural wonders or curiosities therein, or commit unauthorized waste in any form upon the lands or other public property therein, or who shall violate any of the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined in the sum of not more than $5,000, or be imprisoned for a period of not more than twelve months, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make exchange with the owners of any land included within the limits of the said Petrified Forest National Park of an equal quantity of nonmineral, vacant, surveyed public land open to settlement, within the limits of the Territory of Arizona, of approximately the same value, and when such exchanges are made the owners of such lands to be so exchanged shall convey the same by perfect title to the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents to issue for the public land so exchanged to the persons making such exchange, or to their assigns.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8326) to set apart certain lands in the Territory of Arizona as a public park, to be known as the Petrified Forest National Park. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a statement from the gentleman as to the bill.

Mr. LACEY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill passed the House in substantially the same form it is now reported in the last Congress, but did not pass the Senate. The proposed park is one of the most wonderful regions, not only in the United States, but in the whole world. There are other petrified forests in many countries, but this is the petrified forest of the world. It lies near the line of the Santa Fe Railway and would be visited by thousands of people if the proper arrangements were made for taking care of visitors. The stone forest is in a desert. It is surrounded by land of practically no value, and reserving it for the whole people will not in any way interfere with any settlement. It lies about 7,200 feet above the sea.

This wonder of the world lies in an atmosphere the purest and clearest ever breathed. There are three distinct but almost contiguous exposed tracts of the forest in view. Leaving the Santa Fe Railroad at either Holbrook or Adamana, the whole region can be visited easily in a day. The geological history of this deposit is astounding in its simplicity, and it makes the mind dizzy to think of the age of the trees that lie prone upon the sand exposed to the gaze of the visitor. Let me give some idea of its antiquity. The trees are of an extinct species, and are coniferous in their character. This forest is old enough for the trees to have grown to over 4 or 5 feet in diameter and to a height of 140 feet or more, and the smaller ends are often 2 or 3 feet in diameter.

Those trees fell down ages ago; were washed down some prehistoric, yes, pre-Adamite stream, and floated upon some ancient sea until the points of the roots and smaller branches were worn away. Then they sank to that venerable sea bottom, waterlogged and saturated with the salt water of the ocean. There they became covered with sand. They are ancient enough for a deposit of 40 feet of soft sandstone to have been slowly built over them by the action of the waves. There they turned to chalcedony, preserving within their bark more than the colors of the rainbow, and combining purple, pink, white, black, gray, blue, and orange in endless variety. Slowly the land rose until that old sea bottom was over 7,000 feet above the ocean of to-day. There, concealed under a heavy stratum of sandstone, they lay for countless ages.

A modern stream, usually dry, but often for a brief time after a rain an active torrent, aided by the wind, has carried off the particles of sandstone as they became detached from the old sedimentary deposit, and these trees have gradually been uncovered. There they lie to-day, thickly scattered, looking at a distance like a freshly drifted lot of waterworn trees. Along the edges of the bluffs may be seen the trunks projecting into the valley from under the old sandstone formation, preserving thus a faithful record of their geological history. Lying thus upon the old bottom of the sea and preserved for all time by their own indestructible hardness, this remarkable forest needs protection only from the hand of man. Nature may attack it in vain. Such a wonder as this is well worthy to be preserved by having thrown over it the protection of the Government of the United States. This bill passed the House unanimously in the last Congress; I trust it will do so again this morning.

An attempt was made by commercial vandals to wholly destroy these trees a few years ago by working them all up into emery. A mill was put up, but the discovery was made that stone much nearer the market in Canada would answer the same purpose and the forest has been spared. It is time now to reserve it, before some other ingenious individual takes the matter of its destruction in hand. There have been many of these tree trunks blown up with dynamite in order to get the crystals from their center.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it a part of the public domain?

Mr. LACEY. It is upon the public domain.

Mr. McRAE. What is the area of this proposed park?

Mr. LACEY. About two townships.

Mr. McRAE. How many settlers are there in it?

Mr. LACEY. None at all.

Mr. McRAE. Then why the provisions for exchange?

Mr. LACEY. There is provision for lieu lands in a different form from any other heretofore made. The amendment requires that arrangements must be first made with the Secretary of the Interior before any selection can be made, so as to relieve this from the old objections as to lieu lands.

Mr. McRAE. If there are no settlers in the reservation of the proposed park, who owns the land?

Mr. LACEY. The railway company. The alternate sections belong to the railroad. I think there are no settlers whatever. There were some locations originally made, but abandoned. The land is utterly worthless for any agricultural purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suppose this is the same petrified forest in Arizona about which we have heard so much heretofore.

Mr. LACEY. It is the same forest. The matter was up in the last Congress, and the House passed the bill unanimously.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have heard much of the wondrous petrified forest of Arizona. I think the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is accredited with the statement that it stands single and alone in the world of wonders.

May I ask if this is the forest where petrified birds sing petrified songs as they perch on the branches of petrified trees; the one wherein the petrified fish are seen swimming in petrified streams; the one wherein the buffalo is seen suspended in mid-air, having tried to jump across a canyon and having been petrified in its transit, and hanging there because, as it is stated, the laws of gravitation are petrified, too?

Mr. LACEY. No; that was in the Yellowstone. There are no petrified songs in Arizona. All songs there are strictly up to date.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill will again pass the House with the same unanimity as in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Where petrified fish swam in petrified streams. I think this is the one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GRANTING PRIVILEGES TO THE MOBILE, JACKSON AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12452) granting to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to use for railroad purposes the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held for light-house purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of provisions hereinafter contained there is hereby granted to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to build and construct wharves, docks, piers, and other structures for use in the operation of its railroad upon the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held by the United States for light-house purposes, and to lay its tracks upon and over said wharves, docks, and piers: Provided, however, That at least 300 feet of said wharves, docks, and piers shall be designated and set apart, subject to the approval of the Light-House Board, for the exclusive use of the United States for light-house purposes, which said wharves, docks, and piers so designated and set apart shall be maintained and kept in repair by the said railroad company, and the water approaches thereto kept dredged at the United States dredged channel depth without cost to the United States.

SEC. 2. That within fifteen days after the approval of this act the said railroad company shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury complete plans showing the wharves, docks, and piers to be constructed, upon which shall be designated the portion of said proposed wharves, docks, or piers to be set apart for the use of the United States as provided in the first section of this act, said plans, in so far as said wharves, docks, and piers are to be erected upon the lands of the United States, to be approved by the Light-House Board.

SEC. 3. That within thirty days from the approval of the plans as hereinbefore provided the said railroad company shall commence the construction of the said wharves, docks, and piers, and shall within five months from the commencement of the said work have completed and ready for use by the United States that portion of the said wharves, docks, and piers designated as hereinbefore provided for the use of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the United States shall have free access at all times across the tracks of said railroad company by the most convenient route, to be determined by the Light-House Board, for pedestrians, drays, and wagons, for light-house purposes, to the end of the wharf or pier designated as hereinbefore provided: Provided, however, That the United States shall have the right at any time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to take possession, for public purposes, of said tract of land and the wharves, docks, piers, and other structures so built and erected upon the land of the United States, and the United States shall thereafter make the said railroad company just compensation for the said structures so made upon the land of the United States by the said railroad company, and so taken by the United States, and said compensation shall be paid as soon as the amount thereof may be determined in the manner hereinafter provided. Should the Secretary of the Treasury and said railroad company be unable to agree as to the amount to be so paid by the Government, either party may bring proper proceedings in the circuit court of the United States at Mobile, in the State of Alabama, to ascertain and determine the amount of the liability of the United States: And provided further, That should the United States repossess itself of said land on account of failure of the railroad company to comply with the terms and provisions of this act, then the United States shall not be required to compensate the railroad company for said structures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. This is private pension day.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in their order under the rule for this day.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of certain bills upon the Private Calendar under the rule, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

THOMAS BLACKBURN.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2877) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the record of Thomas Blackburn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to correct the military record of Thomas Blackburn, late a member of the Eighty-fifth New York Infantry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date May 30, 1862, from Company G of said regiment: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowances shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles B. Wingfield, late of Company A, First Regiment United States Dragoons, war with Mexico, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SUSAN HAYS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3103) granting an increase of pension to Susan Hays.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan Hays, widow of John C. Hays, late colonel First Regiment Texas Mounted Rangers, war with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Chairman, Mrs. Hays, the beneficiary of this bill, is not a resident of my district, but I knew her husband quite well, and at the request of many of the most influential and prominent citizens of California I introduced the bill to increase her pension. Senator BATE, who was a lifelong friend of Colonel Hays, and an officer in his regiment during the war with Mexico, introduced a similar bill in the Senate. The bill of Senator BATE passed the Senate, increasing the pension of Mrs. Hays to $30 a month. It was sent over to the House, referred to the Committee on Pensions, but that committee saw fit to report the bill with an amendment reducing the pension from thirty to twelve dollars a month. Col. Jack Hays, as he was familiarly known, was born near the Hermitage, Tennessee, in 1817. In 1837 he moved to Texas, and at the age of 19 joined the United States forces. He fought with conspicuous gallantry and bravery in many of the Indian and border wars. He organized and commanded the famous company of Texas Rangers, and was twice mustered in as the colonel of the First Texas Mounted Rangers.

He commanded a regiment also under General Taylor and under General Scott, and at the close of the Mexican war moved to California. His long and honored career in Texas, Mexico, and California would fill volumes, for he was ever in the midst of times that "tried men's souls," ever in the front and conspicuous as a leader when danger threatened, and when the success of an enterprise depended on personal bravery and calm judgment. His widow is a most estimable lady, a lady of culture and refinement, but she is 73 years of age, feeble in health, and destitute in circumstances. If the career of her distinguished and honored husband entitles her to any consideration, then I ask that this committee amendment be voted down and that the bill passed by the Senate be favorably reported; for I am frank to say that I would honestly prefer to have this measure defeated than to have the bill passed granting her a paltry increase of $4 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Pensions gave this case particular and careful attention. We have no issue to make with the gentleman from California on the worthy, honorable, and distinguished career of Colonel Hayes, but we have a fixed policy upon the part of your Committee on Pensions that applies to this case as it applies to all others, and has been enforced during the present Congress. It is this: That no consideration is given whatever in rating these matters to rank. This widow is receiving $8 a month. It matters not whether her husband was a major-general, a brigadier-general, or a colonel, the committee has adopted a policy of allowing pensions only for service and not for rank.

That has been the universal rule regarding soldiers of the Mexican war. There is not a single exception that I can now recall, and I see no reason why there should be a departure from that conservative and wise rule in behalf of Mrs. Hayes. In accordance with that rule we have fixed this pension at $12 a month. I have not the remotest personal feeling in the matter, but acting as I am to-day in the place of the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER], who is absent, I earnestly desire to maintain the rule established by the Committee on Pensions.

Now, there are some cases that have been before the committee which we have acted upon where we not only allow for service pension, but also for disabilities. This bill and amendment proposed by the gentleman from California goes even higher than the service and disability pension heretofore allowed by the committee, because it has never allowed a Mexican soldier more than $25 where the soldier was disabled totally by injury or wounds received in the service. This amendment proposed by the gentleman exceeds the service pension and disability pension combined; and we ask that the amendment by the committee be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was considered; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama) there were—16 ayes and 52 noes.

So the committee amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a petition, not upon this particular question but another question, referring to the repeal of the tax on tobacco. Without taking up the committee's time, I will ask unanimous consent to put it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It is very short, only a couple of typewritten pages.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may place in the RECORD as a part of his remarks upon the bill the document which he sends to the Clerk's desk. Without objection this permission will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The petition is as follows:

At a mass meeting in Clarksville, Tenn., on April 7, 1902, the following was agreed upon:

To the honorable Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee:

We, your petitioners, in behalf of ourselves and children, and in behalf of the 300,000 toilers in the tobacco field, one-half of whom are colored and one-half white, and in behalf of the wives and children of said 300,000 field laborers, numbering about one and a half millions, all of whom are dependent largely for food and clothes on what money they get for their tobacco, now impoverishingly low by depression of prices caused by and striven for by the tobacco manufacturers and their association combines, and in behalf of justice and right and government equity to all toilers in the field, pray your honorable committee to repeal all tax on manufactured tobacco, because the tax on it enables the manufacturer of large means to crush manufacturers of moderate amount of money by dropping the price below cost in the consumer's market for a time, or as long as may be necessary to crush the manufacturer of small money, when they quickly recover losses sustained in crushing their opponents of small and moderate means by raising prices to consumers.

This they have done till the men of small means know the manufacturers' combine and their associates, consisting largely of those who buy for emperors and kings, will make them lose the money they put into the business of manufacturing tobacco, and therefore the manufacturers' combine, by reason of the tax of 6 cents a pound, have all power over the markets when the growers have to sell the product of their toil, and this power they exercise with such greedy oppression as impoverishes the laborer in the tobacco field; and as long as the tax of 6 cents on the pound of manufactured tobacco continues among the internal-revenue laws of the United States the Government virtually handcuffs the poorly paid laborer in the tobacco field and invites the cupidity of the wealthy manufacturers of tobacco to rob him and his wife and children.

If your honorable committee can not arrange sufficient revenue without some tax on tobacco, we, as men who have responded with our money and our blood for the maintenance of our Government, ask and pray that it be reduced to 2 or 3 cents, as this will diminish the power of the manufacturers' combine to crush out all competition in our selling markets. Then, too, as to revenue, the Government would get as much money likely with a tax of 3 cents as with a tax of 6 cents, because the price to consumers would be so much lower that they would buy more, perhaps two or three times as much of it, for now the average price paid by consumers for chewing and smoking tobacco is about 75 cents a pound, whereas if the tax was reduced to 2 or 3 cents a pound men of small and moderate means and of enterprise would engage in the business of manufacturing and could stay in the business, because the tax of 2 or 3 cents a pound would be largely saved by these small manufacturers in various economies not easily in the reach of the now manufacturing monopoly.

Still, if your honorable committee can not so abolish or reduce the internal-revenue tax on manufactured tobacco, then we pray your committee to repeal all laws and parts of laws putting any tax on leaf tobacco with the stem in it, and to enact a law plainly declaring that leaf tobacco with the stem in it may be bought and sold free from any tax, and that dealers in leaf tobacco with the stem in it shall not be liable to any molestation by any United States officers, but that dealers in leaf tobacco with the stem in it shall be as free from Government interference and Government tax as our dealers in wool, or cotton, or sugar, or wheat, or corn.

And we, your memorialists, will ever remain, with grateful remembrance, your humble and respectful petitioners.

J. A. ROLLO, Chairman.
W. S. ZILAFRO, Secretary.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee amendment in this instance will not be adopted. This is certainly a very meritorious case. The person applying for a pension in this instance is the widow of ex-Governor Stone, of Iowa. The soldier served for over two years very effectively in the Army, and rendered valuable services, and at the time his services ceased he was colonel in the Army; but by reason of a nomination for governor of the State of Iowa at that time, he resigned his position in the service and became governor of the State.

This applicant for the pension, the widow in this instance, was a war widow. She married him in 1857. She now, since the death of her husband, is very poor. He left her no property. He did not even leave her the exemptions that would be permitted under the law. She is now drawing $8 a month pension. She is greatly afflicted. She is paralyzed, and she needs the attention of some individual at all times. She is in such a condition that she needs help at the hands of the Government. If any of these cases are meritorious, it seems to me that this one is; and it is very important, if I understand the situation, and I think I do, because I have seen her myself and know something of her physical condition. We feel that it would be nothing but justice in this case, and that the committee amendment ought to be voted down. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, in 1861 I was a private soldier in the Third Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, in which Governor Stone entered the service. He was judge of the district court when the war broke out, and the day after the firing on Fort Sumter he ordered the clerk to "adjourn the court until after the war," closed the docket and went home, raised a company and went into the Third Iowa Infantry; afterwards became a major of that regiment, and was wounded at the battle of Blue Mills. He was promoted to colonel of the Twenty-second Iowa, and in the assault on the enemy's works at Vicksburg was severely wounded. He went home on leave, with his arm in a sling, and waiting for his arm to heal he happened to be at the convention of his party, when they took him up and nominated him for governor of Iowa, and elected him almost by acclamation.

He was in public life a long time—four years as governor, Commissioner of the Land Office under the Harrison Administration—and after his long service died poor, leaving his wife nothing. He was an able man, but money making was not his strong point. His wife is now old and entirely paralyzed and helpless, and to grant her a pension of $30 a month under these circumstances, it seems to me, would be a very just action on the part of the House. I am satisfied that the Committee on Pensions, with a full understanding of the situation in this case, will not disagree with me when I say that the amendment ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I ask leave to withdraw the amendment and allow the bill to pass as it was originally.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman withdraws the amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is right.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas, on behalf of the committee, asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee for two or three minutes. I have been absent from the city, and since my return I have not been able to be at the House and was not able to place in the RECORD my remarks (extended) on the river and harbor bill. This morning I received some information which I did not have when the river and harbor bill was pending here, information which has been hard to get. This information, received from the Commissioner of Labor, is very pertinent to the river and harbor bill, which is now pending in the Senate and, of course, will come back to the House. And I ask the indulgence of the committee, in view of the fact that I have just received this information and was unable to extend my remarks under the rule, for the reason that I did not have this information.

These two pages of figures give the assessed valuation of the real and personal property of the counties that abut on the Cumberland River from its beginning. I think, to its mouth, and the counties which adjoin the abutting counties, but which do not abut on the river. In other words, it shows the assessed valuation of the real and personal property two counties deep on each side of the Cumberland River. I will not take up the time of the committee to read these figures, but it is important to have them, and I ask the committee to allow me to place them in the RECORD.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the matter the gentleman refers to has the slightest relation to any of the pending pension bills, and that the Committee of the Whole might give unanimous consent for the transaction of business before it, but not for the transaction of business of the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can not hear the distinguished gentleman from Kansas. He has addressed the committee twice this morning, but neither time did I hear a word he said. I hope the gentleman heard what I stated—that is, that we were all allowed to "extend" our remarks on the river and harbor bill, but I did not have and could not get this authentic information until this morning, and the time to extend my remarks has expired. Now, I have the desired information. It is very pertinent to the matter discussed in the House at the time the river and harbor bill was being discussed here, and which will be discussed in the Senate in a day or two. I hope the gentleman will indulge me that courtesy under the circumstances.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I have not the slightest objection to the gentleman's asking unanimous consent of the House at the proper time, but I object to lumbering up the record of business upon the Private Calendar with discussion of matter that pertains to general legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the insertion of the remarks the gentleman refers to in the RECORD would need to be by unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Kansas objects. The Chair assumes it can be done in the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask the indulgence of the committee, then, to read just a few conclusions at the end. It will take but very little time—just a minute or two.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. If the gentleman is making an amendment to a pension bill pending, I have no objection to his speaking to that, but the question of the taxation of four counties in Tennessee has nothing to do with the matter pending before the committee at this time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will not insist, but I want to say to the gentleman that he is treating this material matter and the man who proposes it not with that consideration and courtesy with which I have always treated the pension advocates and lovers of pension laws, who hardly ever come here except to enact pension laws, whereas I have come here day after day, and sometimes night after night, and am here now to help the gentleman pass his just pension laws and fight his unjust pension bills. Yet the gentleman is now inconsiderate in his action toward me.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that the gentleman is extending his distinguished consideration and courtesy to the committee. I have no objection to that part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks upon the bill now pending the statement which he has outlined to the committee, and the Chair will ask if there is objection.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas objects. The question is on the amendment of the pending bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee will pardon me for the time used in submitting a few remarks on the subject of service pensions.

On April 3, 1897, the house of representatives of the State of Nebraska passed a resolution urging the Senators and Representatives in Congress to pass a service-pension bill, and on April 10, 1897, in compliance with their resolution, I introduced a service-pension bill. The war with Spain coming on overshadowed nearly all kinds of legislation, but I made an effort to get a hearing before the committee, but it was never reached. In the Fifty-sixth Congress I did not introduce a service-pension bill, but cooperated with other members in attempting to have a law enacted providing for a nonpartisan pension court to hear appeals and make recommendations to Congress, believing if the measure became a law that there would be some form of a service-pension bill recommended by said pension court. The measure failed to become a law. In the Fifty-seventh Congress I introduced a service-pension bill, a copy of which, with suggested amendments, follows my remarks.

From the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions it appears that there are 370,037 claims of all kinds pending, arising from the civil war. Twenty-four thousand two hundred and six are claims for accrued pensions, 6,577 are claims filed by soldiers who have since died, 11,798 have never been adjudicated, 32,520 are rejected claims, 41,399 are claims for new disabilities, and 228,534 are claims for increase, making a total of 355,034, and 15,203 unclassified. There are 33,532 pending claims on account of the war with Spain in addition to the above.

According to the estimates prepared in the War Department, there should now be living 965,313 survivors of the war of the rebellion, excluding deserters. There are now on the pension rolls the names of 735,789 invalid pensioners, exclusive of those based on the war with Spain, leaving 229,524 survivors of the civil war who are not pensioners. The Commissioner of Pensions says that about 25 per cent of those have filed claims for pensions. The annual value of each pension for civil-war service was decreased from $132.39 to $131.87 since the report of the Commissioner of Pensions was issued for the year 1900.

Under the provisions of my bill giving $12 per month to each survivor of the civil war there would be required $33,051,456 to pay the 229,524 survivors not yet pensioned.

On page 90 of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that under the act of June 27, 1890, there are pensioned:

	Per month.
104,834 at.....	$6
4 at.....	7
138,233 at.....	8
38,452 at.....	10
138,900 widows at.....	8
4 widows at.....	10

By computation it appears that it would take $21,776,496 per year to bring all up to $12 per month.

On page 89 of the same report is given in detail the different monthly rate paid under the general law to pensioners, and by computation it appears that it would take $6,391,324.20 per year to bring all up to $12 per month. This makes a total of $28,167,820.20 for the veterans and the widows to bring them all up to $12 per month.

On page 18 of the report of the Commissioner of Pensions it appears that there should now be living 965,313 survivors of the civil war. There are now on the pension rolls the names of 735,789 invalid pensioners, exclusive of those based on service in the war with Spain, and nearly all of these are pensioners on account of the civil war.

These figures indicate that there are 229,524 survivors of that war who have never been pensioned, and only 25 per cent of whom have filed claims for pensions. To allow this 25 per cent who have applied $144 annual pension would require $8,262,720. That would leave 172,143 survivors who have not yet and probably a large number never will ask for a pension. But to the end that we may touch "high-water" mark let us provide for allowing all of them a pension of $144 annually which would require $24,788,592.

To bring all now on the pension rolls up to $12 would require $28,167,820.20; to allow all survivors who have applied, $8,262,720; to allow those survivors who have never applied, $24,788,592, making a total increase of $61,219,132.20. The House appropriated this session $138,500,000. This makes a grand total of $199,719,276.20.

On page 90 of said report there are 281,583 veterans, 138,904 widows, and on page 89 there are 120,274 veterans and 1,620 widows, and on page 18 there are 229,524 veterans, making a total of 771,905 who, under my proposed bill, would receive $111,154,320 in United States Treasury notes, called "pension money," which would leave to be appropriated from the United States Treasury $88,564,956.20.

Of course it is apparent that this would make a saving of medical examining fees and increases under all of the laws, claims for which are now pending, and expense of administering the Pension Bureau, which is largely conjectural, though it must be a great sum. From the best information that I can obtain, a conservative estimate of the average age of the survivors of the civil war is about 60 years, which gives an expectation of life of about fourteen years. The appropriation and issue would therefore decrease each year one-fourteenth, or $14,265,662.30.

I want to call your attention to the further fact that my bill provides for a pension for the widows and minor children, while some of the others do not. Another difference between other bills and mine is that the others depend upon an appropriation from the public Treasury, and if the appropriation is insufficient there can be no more claims allowed. Mine issues the money upon the allowance of claims, to be redeemed in five years from date of issue, thus automatically appropriating the money when the claim is allowed without further legislation being necessary.

At this place the practical question arises, from what source will the money be derived to pay these increased pensions, and it seems to me to be the part of wisdom instead of making an additional demand upon our revenues under present conditions, to follow the precedents established in the early part of our civil war; to issue demand notes which are in effect noninterest-bearing obligations of the United States, having the legal-tender function which constitutes money, and behind it as a guaranty is the wealth of this nation—over two and a half billion acres of land with all the cities, villages, and property of our country, and all the genius, energy, rustle, and capacity of 75,000,000 people—the same to be redeemable at any time after five years from the date of its issue at the option of the Government; and it is provided that it shall be receivable at its nominal value in full payment for all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, amounts due on sale of public land, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States of America.

This is an application of the law of set-off that has existed in the common law of England since time out of mind and is the "law of the land," because it is not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or with any law passed by Congress, for there is no way under the present financial law to maintain as a standard of payment legal-tender notes unless you exchange gold coin for them or stand ready to do so, but there is a way to redeem them other than by tendering gold, and that way is by set-off, by standing ready to receive the notes in payment of all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States of America.

There is nothing original on my part in providing for the issue of this kind of money, and it simply follows the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered on January 15, 1872, in the cases of Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis, reported in 12 Wallace, page 457, and is now the law of the land, never having been reversed, modified or distinguished; in fact has been reaffirmed in Juilliard v. Greenman, 110 United States, page 421. This case was decided March 3, 1884, and declares the law to be that Congress has the constitutional power to make the Treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts in time of peace as well as in time of war.

To illustrate: On April 9, 1902, the Government receipts were as follows, viz:

Customs.....	$1,007,396.67
Internal revenue.....	609,760.73
Miscellaneous.....	168,133.54
Total receipts.....	1,785,290.94

The "pension money" provided in this bill could be used by way of set-off to pay in part some of the debts and demands due the United States and are redeemed and paid in that way. Under the option of the Government, after five years from the date of its issue it may ultimately redeem the notes in the manner then provided by law, and being issued every three months no such amount could be presented at any one time as to deprive the Government of ample funds to meet other obligations.

While I am a strong believer in scientific money, and more convinced of its justice as the years roll by, yet as a lawmaker, to reach practical ends, I must take into account the law as it now exists. The financial law now upon our statute books provides for the redemption of greenbacks in gold, and if at any time the gold reserve falls below $100,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue bonds. Therefore, to prevent the issuance of bonds, I provide for time of the redemption of the pension greenback to be five years from the date of its issue, which carries us by two Congressional and one Presidential election and gives an opportunity to repeal the Republican financial law now in force in this country. As the pensions are paid quarterly, the money would be issued quarterly, thus preventing a demand for redemption oftener than quarterly after the five years expires. The pension greenback, outside this redemption feature made necessary by our financial law, is identical with the Abraham Lincoln greenbacks, good for all debts, public and private, with no exception clause of any kind.

There is an item of expense in regard to the administration of pensions that escapes general notice from the fact that it is carried in another appropriation bill, and that is the expense of the Pension Department at Washington, D. C.

In the legislative appropriation bill, which passed the House February 7, 1902, are the following items:

Pension Office: For the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; First Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; Second Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,250; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; 2 qualified surgeons, who shall be experts in their profession, at $2,000 each; 38 medical examiners, who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $1,800 each; 10 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,250; chief of board of review, $2,250; 57 principal examiners, at $2,000 each; 20 assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; 3 stenographers, at $1,600 each; 70 clerks of class 4; 85 clerks of class 3; 330 clerks of class 2; 400 clerks of class 1; 250 clerks, at $1,000 each; 145 copyists; superintendent of building, $1,400; 2 engineers, at $1,200 each; 3 firemen; 33 messengers; 12 assistant messengers; 20 messenger boys, at $400 each; 45 laborers; 10 female laborers, at $400 each; 15 charwomen; 1 painter, skilled in his trade, $900; 1 cabinetmaker, skilled in his trade, $900; captain of the watch, $840; 3 sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; 20 watchmen; in all $1,664,810.

For per diem, when absent from home and traveling on duty outside the District of Columbia, for special examiners, or other persons employed in the Bureau of Pensions detailed for the purpose of making special investigations pertaining to said Bureau, in lieu of expenses for subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance and any other necessary expenses, including telegrams, $350,000: Provided, That two special examiners or clerks detailed and acting as chief and assistant chief of the division of special examiners may be allowed, from this appropriation, in addition to their salaries and in lieu of per diem and all expenses for subsistence, a sum sufficient to make their annual compensation $3,000 and $1,800, respectively, and whenever it may be necessary for either of them to travel on official business outside the District of Columbia by special direction of the Commissioner, he shall receive the same allowance in lieu of subsistence and for transportation as is herein provided for special examiners and detailed clerks engaged in field service; and the Secretary of the Interior shall so apportion the sum herein appropriated as to prevent a deficiency therein.

For an additional force of 150 special examiners for one year, at a salary of $1,800 each, $195,000, and no person so appointed shall be employed in the State from which he is appointed; and any of those now employed in the Pension Office, or as special examiners, may be reappointed if they be found to be qualified.

This makes an annual salary and expense roll for the Pension Office at Washington alone of $2,509,810. My bill, if enacted into law, would so simplify matters that one-fourth of the present number of employees could attend to the work without detriment to the public service. Curiously, this is a larger amount than is paid to the 17,630 pensioners residing in the State of Nebraska, who receive $2,414,213 annually. Notwithstanding the 33,532 claims pending on account of the war with Spain, the Appropriation Committee reports a bill for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, of the smallest amount appropriated for that purpose since 1891. Since my service in Congress I have had a great number of personal complaints against Commissioner Evans, and many resolutions have been sent to me condemning his methods of administering the Pension Department.

I think, from my experience and observation, that many of them are unfair and unmerited. Mr. Evans administers a department under laws made by Congress and rules made by his superior officers and a fixed appropriation. It must be plain to anyone that when the appropriation is made he must first take therefrom the amount of the pensions that are already allowed, and the balance forms the fund, together with that which remains after the death of a pensioner, from which to allow original, increase, accrued, widow's, and minor's pensions, and when that part of the fund is exhausted there can be no further allowance, no matter what the testimony filed may show. The amount of the appropriation for payment of pensions is in a recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior, who is the superior officer to Mr. Evans, and the Secretary, being one of the Cabinet officers, is on confidential relations with the President of the United States.

Every little while Mr. Evans is sued for from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars damages by some attorney whom he has disbarred from practicing in his department, and that on top of all the charges and resolutions that are aimed at him. It is not fair. Put the blame where it belongs—on Mr. Evans's superior officers. Those officers might answer that the blame really rests on Congress for not passing proper laws, and to that charge I answer, speaking for myself, that I have introduced a reasonable, rational service-pension bill, which is all that I can do. I might be asked why my bill does not cover the Spanish-war survivors. I reply that that was such a short time ago that plenty of evidence can be obtained in their behalf. In 1828 Congress passed a service-pension bill for all the survivors of the Revolutionary war, forty-seven years after the close of the war. It is now thirty-seven years after the close of the civil war, and this Government is much better able to pay a service pension to the survivors of that war than were our fathers to the heroes of the Revolution.

[H. R. 7656, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session. In the House of Representatives, January 6, 1902.]

Mr. STARK introduced the following bill: which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

A bill granting a service pension to soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows and orphans, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That every soldier, sailor, or marine, whether an officer or an enlisted man, who enlisted and was sworn into the military, naval, or marine service of the United States in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and who was honorably discharged therefrom, shall, from and after the passage of this act, receive a pension of $12 per month: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall in no manner interfere with any pension now being received by a pensioner, except to raise the same to the sum of $12 per month where a less sum is now being received; nor shall it in any manner interfere with the right to an increase, rating of a pension, or other right now enjoyed under the pension laws in force.

SEC. 2. That the Army, Navy, and marine service rolls, and an honorable discharge shall be the only evidence required to entitle any soldier, sailor, or marine to the pension granted by this act; and the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby directed to formulate such rules for the identification of such soldiers, sailors, or marines as may be necessary.

SEC. 3. That in the event of the death of any soldier, sailor, or marine who is drawing or who has drawn a pension under the provisions of this act or under the provisions of any other law or laws of the United States, no matter what the cause of death may be, the widow of such soldier, sailor, or marine, while she remains such widow, shall be entitled to a widow's pension of $12; and any minor child or children of any dead soldier, sailor, or marine who, if living, would be entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act or any other law or laws now enforced, shall be allowed the sum of $5 per month each until each child or children shall have attained the age of 18 years.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued quarterly Treasury notes of the United States which shall be full legal-tender paper money of the United States of America, and shall be receivable at its nominal value in full payment for all taxes, internal-revenue duties, excises, duties on imports, amounts due on sale of public lands, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States of America, and be redeemable at any time after five years from the date of its issue, at the option of the Government, in sufficient quantity to pay the amounts due under the provisions of this act, and in denominations of $5 and $2 bills; and all pension payments under the provisions of this act shall be made in these bills to pensioners, and said money shall be reissued whenever and as often as it may become the property of the United States of America until redeemed, and all penalties for counterfeiting and all provisions of law for the renewal of any mutilated or worn-out United States of America paper money shall apply to the pension money hereby created.

SEC. 5. That in all official statements and publications of the Treasury Department of the United States of America showing the amounts of gold and silver coins and certificates, United States notes, and national-bank notes in circulation, the various amounts issued under this act shall be designated as "pension money."

The next business was the bill (S. 4643) granting an increase of pension to Pheobe L. Peyton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Pheobe L. Peyton, widow of Jacob M. Peyton, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and captain Company I, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM W. RICHARDSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 945) granting an increase of pension to William W. Richardson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William W. Richardson, late of Company F, Thirty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

PHINEAS CURRAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12468) for the relief of Phineas Curran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Phineas Curran, late of Company G, Thirty-eighth New Jersey Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "Thirty-eighth," insert the word "Regiment."

In line 7 strike out the word "Volunteers" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Volunteer Infantry."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Phineas Curran."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

IDA S. MCKINLEY.

The next business was the bill (S. 2063) granting a pension to Ida S. McKinley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Ida S. McKinley, widow of William McKinley, late President of the United States, and pay her a pension at the rate of $5,000 per year from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear some explanation of the principle or precedent, either or both, on which this bill is supposed to rest.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the bill is in conformity to the uniform practice of this Government to give to the widow of a deceased President a pension of this character. A pension corresponding in all respects to this was given to the widow of George Washington; to the widow of John Quincy Adams; to the widow of William Henry Harrison, $25,000 in a round sum; to Dolly Madison; to Sarah Childress Polk, $5,000 a year; to Margaret S. Taylor, widow of Zachary Taylor; to Dandridge Bettie Taylor, daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor; to Julia Gardiner Tyler, a pension of $5,000 a year; to Mary Lincoln, widow of Abraham Lincoln, $25,000, from which was to be deducted any amount paid on account of salary, and a pension in addition of $5,000 a year; to Julia Dent Grant, widow of General Grant, $5,000 a year; to Mrs. Garfield, $5,000 a year, with $50,000 additional. And then we gave to the executor of the estate of Henry Wilson, who died while Vice-President, $10,332, and to Eliza C. Hendricks, widow of Thomas A. Hendricks, who died while Vice-President, $8,000.

Mr. BELL. Then this is in accordance with uniform precedent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has been uniform practice. I have no knowledge of any case where this was not done where the President left a widow surviving.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word. If, as appears to be the fact, this is in accordance with a precedent, the precedent is absolutely wrong and indefensible as applicable to a true republic. If this splendid woman could possibly spend—could possibly use this money, or if she had a child to whom it might possibly go, I would be one of the first to say, "Yes, she must have it." But it is utterly impossible for her to spend the income of her estate.

She has an independent estate in her own right. The New York Journal a few days ago had a whole page covered with a description of her mines and the stock of her mines alone at market value of stock in the McKinley Mining Company is worth over $150,000. I understand that she has much property besides. Her husband's estate invoiced—that which went into the hands of the executors—$310,000. She has no heirs whatever, and she can not possibly spend the income of her own fortune.

Now, then, the Government, under the sanction of pension laws, presumes to be just to every pensioner from the lowest to the highest; and I want to suggest to our friends that we have hundreds of thousands of widows of old soldiers who died in the ditches defending this country who can not get a pension, because of difficulty of making proof. Under the dependent act widows are refused pensions who have an income of $250. Now, I want to say that this bad precedent gives this pension to collateral heirs only. It does not go to this splendid woman, and God knows I sympathize with her as much as any man can, but I am not willing to give my sanction to a precedent that is an absolute wrong because of our sentiment for the woman.

Now, this $5,000 per annum that this Congress proposes to give—and I know she does not ask it; I do not believe she wants it—would pay a pension of $8 a month to 52 of these old widows whose husbands' lives were shortened by reason of fighting for this country and whom we refuse to pension because they have an income of $250 per annum. I am not going to object to this pension of Mrs. McKinley. The gentleman [Mr. GROSVENOR] says it is according to precedent. I say if it is according to precedent it is a bad precedent for a Republic which presumes that every man is as good as his neighbor. I would say that if there is any possibility of this splendid woman needing this or wanting it, or if she had an heir, she should have it. But she is absolutely independent, from a financial standpoint, has no heir, and still she must have this $5,000 a year to bequeath to some collateral heirs.

Now, I dislike to be compelled to say this much, but we do a great many wrongs, not from lack of judgment so much as from sentiment, and this is nothing more than a sentimental act of this House and of the other House, because of the sad, sad occurrence which took place but a short time ago; but let me say to you that your sentiments would be directed in channels that could be approved much easier by thoughtful consciences if you would distribute this $5,000 among 52 old widows of soldiers of the late war, who can not get pensions because we say that the Government can not afford to pay those who have the pittance of $250 per year. I want it understood that I make these remarks because I think a precedent that forces this pension where it can not be used, and is probably not desired, is wrong.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret the gentleman from Colorado should have taken this occasion to say some of the things which he has said. It is not pleasant for me to submit to the truth of his statement that this pension is not asked for by Mrs. McKinley and not desired by her, when I know the exact reverse of that is probably true. I have never known the widow of a President of the United States to come begging at the door of Congress for a bill to be passed in conformity with the principle and proposition of this bill. I do not believe that the widow of President Polk of Tennessee, whom I had the honor to know, ever asked Congress to give her a pension, nor did she leave behind her, as I recollect it, any heir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. None at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I state now upon new information which agrees with my own nearly perfect knowledge that she did not. I think that this Government of ours, Mr. Chairman, is a little bit above a coroner's inquest to ascertain whether a woman has children or may have children or not. I leave that field of discussion to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL]. I know nothing about the value of the mine alleged to be held in some part by Mr. McKinley. It may be valuable and it may be worthless, as nine out of ten of the Western mines have been. No bill of this kind has ever been put upon the basis of pauperism and indigence. Think of a mighty Government like ours, whose President was shot down in the discharge of a duty that he owed to his country, and went to his grave beloved and honored by men of all parties, putting in motion a coroner's inquest, a vulturous performance headed by a member of Congress to go to the office of the judge of probate of the county to ascertain whether the widow can live or not live.

What a sentiment, what an idea, what an estimate must be put upon the loving generosity of the people of the United States, if they would put their action upon a ground like that. Call it sentiment, if you please. It is sentiment. Bereft of her husband, I do not know how long she may live. The gentleman who seems to have investigated the inventory of the estate has also investigated the length of life that may come to this woman, this lovely woman, who stands to-day the object of the sentiment and love and affection of the American people. I do not believe that in the State of Colorado there can be found three widows of honorably discharged soldiers who would countenance the suggestion made by the gentleman from Colorado. It is the first time, so far as I know, in the history of this legislation, which began at the death of Washington and has come down through all the years, that there was ever found a man with the sentiments of a Shylock standing upon the bridge and estimating the amount of property that the woman might have upon some speculation that her father has entered into.

This lady is not without heirs. She is not without those who have claims upon her. They may be called collateral, if you please, but they are those upon whom she has lavished the love and affection of a lifetime, and in whose behalf she has always taken a great deal of interest.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I deny that the Government of the United States has ever said to a soldier's widow that she could not have a pension because the Government was not able to give it to her. There is no such condition of things. The most liberal system of pensions known to civilization is that of the American people to their soldiers and the widows of their dead soldiers. There has been legislation to cut off a certain class of widows that were ranked in the estimation of Congress as adventuresses; but beyond that the utmost and grandest liberality has been extended to them.

I regret very much that there should have been a discussion of this question over this bill. I do not believe there is an American Congressman who will register in a yea-and-nay vote against the passage of this bill, and it is surely just a little ill-timed now, following so promptly upon the grand exhibition of love and affection that has gone out to McKinley and to his wife and to his Administration from his countrymen, that a discussion of this sordid, venal character should have entered into the question of the passage of a bill that is in entire consonance with the history and spirit and sentiment of this whole country.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. BELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, all are equal before the law. Now, we must have an organization if we have a government. We boast that ours is a government of the people; but somebody here and there must from time to time be in a position to execute the will of the people. Take it in the House, we come here elected every two years, soon to be almost 400 in number, now 360. We get our $5,000 a year. If we die, we are buried at the expense of the contingent fund, and ordinarily the family gets the remainder of the salary to the end of the term, if it does not exceed $5,000.

There is no law for that, but it has grown into a precedent. The same thing is true on the Senate side. Then we have the Executive and we have the courts. We have the Army and the Navy and our foreign representatives, with salaries ranging from $16,000 or $17,000 down, as the case may be. We do not pay as large salaries in this country as they do perhaps in almost all other considerable countries on earth. But the President of the United States gets $50,000 a year, whereas a man who helped elect him earns on an average perhaps $800 a year, perhaps more than that if you average it all over the country. I am not exact—it may be over a thousand. Now, all people can not all the time be equal in salaries and in position. There can only be one President at a time and one Chief Justice at a time, and so on. They change from time to time according to the will of the people. Certain duties are to be performed.

Now, touching these matters, in the history of the Republic certain precedents have been established. Some of them I have referred to. I knew the late President very well, served with him in Congress with many others in the House. It is not necessary for me to speak of his great merit as a legislator, as a citizen, or as President. The practice has grown up of giving pensions to the widows of Presidents. I think it is well not to depart from it. It is true that there are many soldiers' widows and soldier citizens who are not receiving pensions, some of them that ought to; but the proof is defective, perhaps, or otherwise they fail to receive them. Yet, while it is true they do not receive very large pensions as individuals, it is true that they do receive, in the aggregate—soldiers, widows, and all—$140,000,000 in pensions annually, such pensions as were never paid, even in a small degree, to the defenders of the government, in the aggregate, by any other country on earth.

Now, I have said all I wanted to say about this matter. I loved McKinley as a man, as a friend, and as President. But whether I loved him or not, he was our President, and these are the precedents. I have no doubt the bill will pass. I believe it would pass by unanimous consent. Even the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] says that he will not object to the passage of the bill. For me, I think its passage is apt from the standpoint of public policy, as well as the standpoint of precedents that have been made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him has a pension been granted to Mrs. Benjamin Harrison?

Mr. CANNON. I think not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman inform the committee why it has not been?

Mr. CANNON. I will refer the gentleman to the committee. I do not care, so far as I am concerned, to pursue the subject further. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire desire to make a statement?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information is that she is left with much less money than Mrs. McKinley, and I have never heard her name mentioned in this great committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is quite mistaken. The subject has been discussed, and Mrs. Harrison herself has been consulted upon the subject, and action will no doubt be taken. The gentleman from Tennessee will appreciate the fact that Mrs. Harrison stands upon a very different relation to this whole subject-matter than does Mrs. McKinley, or did Mrs. Grant, or Mrs. Garfield, or Mrs. Polk, for Mrs. Harrison married Mr. Harrison after he went out of office.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is so; but she has children by him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to discuss that matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). Mrs. McKinley has none.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When was the question discussed here?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee should have addressed the Chair.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asked the gentleman from Illinois a question. The Chair had previously arranged to recognize the gentleman from North Carolina, and he now has the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. KLUTTZ. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman yields to me for a moment. I ask the gentleman from Ohio when this question was discussed in the House or in the committee about pensioning Mrs. Harrison?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I never said it was discussed in the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that it had been discussed here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not. I said it was discussed between Mrs. Harrison's friends and members of Congress, and the matter will doubtless be taken up in the proper time. I do not want to go into the family affairs of Mrs. Harrison. I shall vote to give her a pension whenever the question will come up, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will do the same thing. The fact that Mrs. Harrison's bill has not yet made its appearance casts no light upon the question whether this bill ought to pass.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is aware of the fact that Mr. Harrison, whom everybody respected, a great man, died long before President McKinley was assassinated, and yet we have heard nothing here of a pension being given to Mrs. Harrison.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why has not the gentleman introduced a bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. She is not one of my constituents.

Mr. GROSVENOR. She is not one of mine, either.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say that I have paid as much attention to pension matters as anyone else, and I have had a constituent of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] write to me to look after a pension claim for him, and I had very great pleasure in doing it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I will say, if my friend will allow me just a moment, that I have many thousands of applications to look after for pensions myself, and I am doing the best I can, and I should be very glad to have my friend help shoulder the matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will do it right now.

Mr. CANNON. And if he is as zealous in that as he is upon the floor it would be well done. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I shall be just as zealous on the floor as anybody, and my record shows that I advocate just pensions as much as any man on the floor, and that I am just as diligent to examine them as anybody and just as diligent in trying to condemn unrighteous pension legislation as anybody, and I insist that this committee ought to do equal and exact justice to the widow of every President of the United States.

Mr. KLUTZ. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill most heartily and cheerfully. [Applause.] I regret very much that the question of a pension for Mrs. Harrison should have been injected into this discussion, as it is entirely irrelevant, not before the House, and the circumstances entirely different. As has been shown by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], this country and the Congress have established a well-defined policy of pensioning the widows of Presidents of the United States, and I think that policy easily justified.

I think it is the duty of this great country, and of this Congress as representing it, to place absolutely beyond want, and beyond peradventure of want, the future of the widows of our Presidents. It is a duty which has been performed in all other cases, and I can see no reason why an exception should be made in this. [Applause.]

Indeed, sir, if the precedent had never been established, if we had not pensioned the widow of a single President, I should be in favor of pensioning the widow of William McKinley. [Applause.] I do not believe this country ever had a more devoted public servant than he. [Applause.] I do not believe that "the earth which holds him dead bears alive a knightlier gentleman." [Applause.] He fell in the prime of his usefulness; fell by the hand of an assassin; fell, to the grief and regret of this great nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I regret that any objection should be raised in this presence against a pension for his widow, especially in view of what we have done for the widows of his predecessors. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this bill will pass unanimously. [Applause.]

It is not a dole of charity. It is but a generous recognition of the universal sentiment of our people toward Mr. McKinley. It is only the expression of a desire that his widow should be placed on a plane with those of his distinguished predecessors and that the remaining desolate years of that life which was so large a part of his should be made more tolerable and more pleasant by that recognition. [Great applause.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who have followed me simply confirm what I said before, that if this is a precedent, it is a bad one. Because in this case, however much the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] may try to escape it, the entire country knows that the widow can not possibly use the pension we are giving her; that she has an independent fortune, and what I attempted to suggest and now suggest is the poor precedent, if this is a precedent.

A few weeks ago, in this House, we had from this same committee a bill cutting down the application for a pension for Captain Slocum's widow. He was shot with a bombshell, and had a most splendid reputation. After a full argument this House stood on the question of $3, insisting that he was shot, as the report stated it, when he was a lieutenant and before he was raised to a captain. That small distinction was made, and though the report said that the soldier died from his injuries in the war, yet, said they, he died from injuries received when he was a lieutenant, and therefore the widow ought not to have more than $17 a month and, by a division in this House, the committee unanimously voted that that widow, who was shown not to have a cent of income, could only have $17 per month, and so they cut her down $3.

Now, as I said before, I am not considering Mrs. McKinley, or Mr. McKinley, or this pension, but this unrepugnant precedent. I would give her anything on earth that she could possibly expend. I would give her anything that was necessary to make her comfortable. Here is a gift of something, however, that can never be expended; here is a gift of a pension to collateral heirs that would give an $8 pension to 52 widows of the soldiers in the last war. I say if we strip it of sentiment, and of this bad precedent, there is where this money might go.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the pension in this case does not rest upon quite the same principle as other pensions reported to the House by the Invalid Pensions Committee. There is no statute law providing for pensions for widows of civil officers of this Government. There is no statute law providing pensions for the widows of Presidents. There is no law of the land requiring that the Washington Monument should have been built; that his statue should stand in every city of the country, or that the statues of Lincoln should adorn the public parks, or that the statues and memorials of the great ancestors of the Republic should stand in this Capitol.

These things all exist because the country owes something to the spirit of patriotism. Men who were as brave as Washington followed him in the ranks. Men who were as loyal as Lincoln carried a musket in the field. No monuments could sufficiently commemorate the patriotism of men who founded the Government or of the men who preserved it, yet the country has recognized its duty to the spirit of patriotism and to the memory of its great men who have rendered eminent and distinguished services to it. The pension roll for private soldiers and officers in the Union Army is called the roll of honor, and a pension is given to them not as charity, nor as the fulfillment of a civil contract, but is given to them as a just recognition of the spirit of patriotism with which they served the country.

The spirit was as voluntary and willing in the private soldier as in him who led the advance in the field, and yet it never was possible for any private soldier to render services upon the field of the Wilderness that could be measured at the same value, even though they bore the same relation to the country that the services of Uncle John Sedgwick bore. It was never possible for the man who carried the musket in the ranks to render as a private soldier the same service to the country that Grant and Sherman and Sheridan rendered. The purpose was the same; the courage and fidelity the same; the spirit of patriotism was the same in all of them—equal in degree; yet to these more distinguished men was intrusted the vast care of the armies that they led and directed, and the recognition of their eminent services comes in the monuments that have been erected in their memory.

This pension for Mrs. McKinley is not granted as charity. It is not based upon the possibility of her needs. It is not based upon any supposed condition of poverty on her part, nor upon any request or demand from her or from her friends. This pension bill is reported to this House from the Committee on Invalid Pensions because no other committee in this House seemed to have jurisdiction of such a measure. It is reported not as charity nor as compensation. It is reported as a testimonial by the country to the value of the eminent services which her great husband rendered to the country. It is reported in response to the spirit of patriotism which his distinguished life and public services inspire.

The other pensions which have been granted to the widows of Presidents in prior times had the same foundation. They were the testimony of the country to the value of the services that had been rendered to the country by the eminent husbands of the recipients of these pensions. They were granted as due from the country to the spirit of patriotism within it, and not as a matter of charity.

I said a little while ago that the great pension roll of the Union Army was neither charity nor contract, but the voluntary offering of the country to the men who gave their services to it. It is true that the general law grants pensions for injuries received in the service, for there seems to be no other foundation on which these pensions might be proportioned, either as to the services rendered or as to the injuries received.

But every soldier knew when he enlisted that the nation had the right to call for his life without any other compensation than the hope that the national life and the National Government might be saved for his land and for his children. These pensions are not granted to pay him for the offering that he made; that debt could not be paid in dollars. Under the general law the pension was graduated according to the disabilities and injuries that he received in the service, simply that there might be an equitable distribution of the bounty of the Government.

Then the pension law of 1890, which is a still further recognition of the spirit of patriotism in the men who served in our armies, grants them a pension when they are disabled from earning a support by their own labors, whether such disability was incurred in the service or since the service, not as any part of an original contract with the Government made in employing them for its defense, not as charity to them as paupers, but as a recognition of the patriotism with which they as volunteers served the country when their hour of duty came; and that pension is proportioned as it is that there may be some equitable distribution of that recognition on the part of the Government.

Under the general law 88,000 widows draw pensions whose husbands died from injuries received upon the field or in active service in behalf of the Government. Under the law of 1890 139,000 widows, many of whom married the men long after the service had been rendered, have received this recognition of the patriotism of the husband who offered and rendered his service to the country, not because the country owed the widow a debt, not because the country owed her charity, but because the country owed to the spirit of patriotism within it a recognition of some kind for services offered for the preservation of the life of the Union.

These soldiers and their widows and orphans are not to be put in the attitude of paupers asking relief or to whom the Government gives a charity. The pension roll is not a national pauper roll. The pension appropriations are not to be deemed a pauper fund. That kind of language cultivates no patriotism.

The pension is the mark of honor which a grateful country bestows on those who have made great sacrifices and who have rendered great services to our country.

And upon this foundation the monuments to our eminent men and the pensions to their widows rest, not because there was any contract on the part of the nation that a duty of this kind should be paid to their memory; not because they were paupers appealing for relief; but because the nation owed it to the men who served her in her hour of trial; owed it to the men whose lives brought national honor—that patriotic service upon the battlefield or in the forum or in the legislative halls should have a just recognition at the hands of a patriotic country. The spirit of patriotism requires it. Upon this foundation we tender to the widow of William McKinley this pension.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary that I should say a word in this debate. I did not intend to participate in it at all. I do not understand that any gentleman on either side of the Chamber has interposed an objection to the passage of this bill. I do not suppose any gentleman here will vote against its passage—none on this side, so far as I know.

Since I have had the honor to occupy a seat on this floor, Mr. Chairman, I have seen pensions voted to the widows of several Presidents; I think to Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Garfield, and to Mrs. Polk—if not the original to her, an increase of her pension. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this custom has been followed for a long time. I can not see any reason why we should depart from that custom in the case now before us. I would not put it upon the ground that the widow of the President was needy. I would not put it upon the ground that it was necessary for her comfort and ease during the remainder of her days that the widow of a President of the United States should be voted a pension.

If it were presented to us as a new proposition, if there had never been a pension heretofore voted to a widow of a President, it might be then that we would stop to inquire whether in the first case the widow was needy and deserving of the pension in order to make the remainder of her days comfortable, contented, and happy; but inasmuch as it has been the time-honored custom of Congress to vote these pensions to the widows of Presidents, I, for one, would not be willing to break that precedent in the case of William McKinley. I am not here to pay any tribute to him; it is not necessary. He deserves all I could say and more, but this is not the time nor the occasion for a tribute to be paid to his memory. For one, Mr. Chairman, I announce that I shall vote for the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Invalid Pensions Committee, and as a member of the minority of that committee, I wish to make a few remarks on this bill. Much has been said, in the first place, about the inequality of pensions. That is a matter which no doubt every gentleman on this floor deprecates, but it is an impossibility to mete out exact justice to every Union soldier, or to the widow of every Union soldier, and it is my deliberate opinion, aside from the wisdom or nonwisdom of a pension law, that inasmuch as we have a pension law, that that law is administered about as well and about as equitably as can be done under the circumstances.

Now, I do not join in the tirade against the Commissioner of Pensions. He construes these matters according to law, not so much according to the spirit of the law, but he has held principally and holds himself to the letter of the law. Such cases in which the Congress believes that possibly not exact justice has been reached go through the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and finally through the Committee of the Whole and through this House, and I believe that in most cases, with few exceptions, approximate justice, if not exact justice, is done. Now, what have we in this case? This is the widow, not only of a brave Union soldier who joined the Union Army when he was a mere youth, who joined it as a private and who came out as a major and who covered himself with glory in that grand struggle, but she is the widow of one who has reflected credit upon this great nation from many standpoints.

I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that this is not the time nor the occasion, nor is it necessary, to enter into a panegyric of William McKinley, and while I appreciate a great many of the great acts that he has done, although I have differed with him as a Democrat in many things that he has done, I say that there is one act of his which stands forth pre-eminent at this time and which should be remembered at this hour when we pass upon the question as to pensioning his widow, and which, if he did nothing else, would be sufficient to immortalize him. That was the fact that he wiped out the last vestige of sectionalism remaining between the South and the North. [Applause.]

Now, in the face of the precedent of having provided for the widows of Presidents and the descendants of Presidents, can it be possible that anyone on this side or on the other side of this House would be willing to make a discrimination between the widows of former Presidents and the widow of our martyr President, William McKinley? Certainly not, and for one who wore the gray in that great struggle, who was a private in the Confederate army, I am not only willing, but, as an act of justice and of patriotism, proud to give to the widow of a major who wore the blue and who since has distinguished himself as a great statesman and civilian that pension which is now offered from this committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Shall the bill granting a pension to Ida S. McKinley be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken, and the bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JANE K. HILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 201) granting an increase of pension to Jane K. Hill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane K. Hill, widow of Roland G. Hill, late first lieutenant, Twentieth, and captain, Twenty-fifth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

IDA M. BRIGGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12370) granting a pension to Ida M. Briggs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ida M. Briggs, widow of Fred T. Briggs, late first lieutenant Company E, First Regiment Washington Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said Fred T. Briggs until they reach the age of 16 years.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In line 8, before the words "and pay her a pension," insert "war with Spain;" and in the same line strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "seventeen."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting the word "seventeen." The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in view of the action of the House on the last few bills I feel that this amendment will meet with the approval of this committee when they are told the facts in this case. I desire to say, as to my interest in this matter, that Lieut. Fred T. Briggs was a neighbor of mine for ten years in my home town. I knew him and I knew his family. A better man or a better soldier never lived. A more estimable lady than his widow does not live.

The facts relative to this matter are that Mr. Briggs enlisted in the war with Spain. He served until his regiment was mustered out. He came home and resumed his business, which was that of an operator, in a small town in our State. A few months ago he blew out his brains. In other words, his death was caused by his own act. The Pension Department held that the proof was not sufficient to connect his death with the service. Testimony has been offered to the committee that has satisfied that committee sufficiently so that they have resolved the doubt in favor of his widow, and have resolved the question in favor of the theory that his death, though by his own hand, was the result of disease that he contracted in the service and of the suffering that he endured on account of that disease.

His medical record shows that for four or five months before he went to the Philippines he suffered with typhoid fever at San Francisco. I know myself that his life hung in the balance for several weeks, and that finally his wife went to San Francisco, expecting to bring his dead body home. He recovered, however, and went with his regiment to the Philippines. He was there treated for malarial fever several times, and he also contracted diarrhea. But he continued in the service, became the adjutant of his regiment, served with much distinction and gallantry, came home with his regiment, and was mustered out.

With reference to his entering the service I want to say that he was a man with a family of four children, one of them at the time that he entered the service being only a couple of years old. I, along with his other neighbors and friends, said to him, "Lieutenant Briggs, you owe a duty to your family. It is not your duty to enlist in this war at this time. The necessities of the Government are not such as to overcome the duty that you owe to your family and to require your enlistment." He said "No, I have been in the National Guard of this State during times of peace. I have been an officer in my company; and now, when the time comes to fight, I feel that it is my duty to answer the call of my governor and my President, and I shall do it." There spoke the brave, loyal, patriotic man that he was.

As I have said, when his regiment was mustered out he came home and went to work. I have seen him since that time, and learned that he had been suffering ever since he came home. I asked him why he did not apply for a pension. He said: "No; I did not fight in the battles of my country in order to get a pension; I will not apply for it;" and he did not. Yet the testimony shows here that this man hardly spent a well day from the time he came home until he took his life. The testimony shows that he was a changed man.

I know myself that before the war, as the report of the committee shows, he was a jolly, jovial, companionable man; but the testimony of witnesses who knew him well since that time and the testimony of his wife shows that after he came home he was melancholy, taciturn, sober, sometimes sullen, and that he constantly complained of intense pain and suffering. I have here an affidavit that I received after the committee made its report, that I did not have an opportunity to present to them, from a man who knew him intimately from the time he came home and became an operator at Spangle, in our State, until his death. I desire to read an extract from this. Leaving out the preliminary part, he says:

That from such sources, as well as from statements made to this affiant by the said Fred T. Briggs, this affiant knows that the said Briggs was in very poor health at the time he went on duty as station agent as aforesaid, being sorely afflicted with rheumatism and diarrhea, which the said Briggs told this affiant he had contracted while in service of the United States Army in the Philippines; that during all his days spent as agent as aforesaid the said Briggs did not get well from said disease, but grew worse, and for six weeks before he took his own life this affiant believed the said Fred T. Briggs was insane, due to his sufferings from rheumatism and diarrhea, many times the said Briggs being almost wholly unable to attend to office duties, and Mrs. Briggs being compelled to aid him to keep up his work. This affiant further says that the average time spent each day with said Fred T. Briggs by this affiant was about two and one-half hours.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of April, A. D. 1902.

[SEAL.]

M. H. SULLIVAN,

A Notary Public in and for the State of Washington, Residing at Spangle, Wash.

I am satisfied, from what I know of Mr. Briggs, from being ten years his neighbor, that his death was caused by the suffering and the hardship that he endured in the service and the pain and disease with which his body was racked after he came home. There was no other reason for it. His relations with his family were of the most loveable and pleasant character. He had no trouble with his friends and neighbors. He lost no property, because he had none. There is no explanation, except that he was crazy, and that this was brought about by the disease and intense and continued suffering.

There is one other ground upon which I ask the favorable action of this committee, and that is justice to his widow. She was his wife when he was at the front battling for the flag of his Government. She endured as much, yea more, even, than he did. I believe that when we come to Congress for special legislation the widow of a soldier, who was his wife during the war, deserves the same gratitude and consideration at the hands of this Government as the soldier himself. While he fought at the front she was fighting the wolf from the door at home and caring for their children. The committee recommends $12. She is the widow of a first lieutenant. As I understand under the general law if the Pension Department had found that his death was due to the service, she would be entitled to $17 as the minimum. That is what I ask by this amendment.

The committee finds the doubt in his favor—that his death was caused by his service. I therefore can see no reason why they should not give $17 a month to his widow. The testimony shows that she is in needy circumstances; that she has four children dependent upon her for their support; that she has no property, and has nothing except the income from some life-insurance money, amounting to about $130 per annum. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the bill that we have just now passed in behalf of Jane K. Hill. Her husband was a first lieutenant. He was a graduate of the Military Academy in 1881, and was in the service until 1898; he was not in any war so far as the report shows. His widow married him in 1886, and he died in the service. The general law gave her $17 a month pension. The committee says:

The testimony accompanying the bill, including the claimant's sworn petition, shows that aside from this pension her income is less than $300 per annum—

This woman that I want this pension for, without her pension, has only $130 per annum—and under all the circumstances your committee believe that some measure of relief may properly be granted, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $25 per month.

I do not complain at this. It is just and right, but if the committee was justified in giving Mrs. Hill $25 I am certainly justified in asking for $17 for Mrs. Briggs.

I believe I would be justified in asking this committee to report this bill as I introduced it, for $25 a month, but I simply come and ask you that in justice to this man, in justice to his widow, that the pitiful sum of $17 a month shall be granted to her. She is not the widow of a general, or a governor, or a President. She is the widow of a humble though brave lieutenant, but she is none the less worthy of the bounty of this Government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised to hear this application from the gentleman from Washington. He has filed no additional evidence whatever, and no obligation rests upon the committee in that respect to change a conclusion that the committee thought satisfactory to the gentleman from Washington. I want to state to the committee why I say I am surprised. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] came before the Committee on Pensions and in a most earnest manner asked the committee to allow this pension. The committee, after hearing the gentleman from Washington and considering all the evidence and solving all the doubts in favor of the widow, fixed the amount in the bill. He introduced the bill at $25 a month, but he said he was willing to abide by whatever the committee did.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I understood it that way. I was the member of the committee, Mr. Chairman, who made the motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it was the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY] that I spoke to. I had introduced a bill for $25, and he expressed his disapproval, and said of course the amount was for the committee to say. But I did not say, and had no thought, that I would submit or abide by whatever the committee might recommend.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It was my pleasure to make the motion. I merely give my impressions as to the remarks made by the gentleman from Washington before the committee. The committee fixed it at this amount—$12 for the widow and $2 each for the three children who are under 16 years of age, making $18. I say to this committee here that with such limited experience as I have had on the Pension Committee in the Fifty-sixth Congress and in this Congress that I have never seen nor heard the committee give more thorough consideration to any case before it than was given to this one. The benefit of all doubts were given to the widow—all solved in her favor.

What are the facts about the case? Take them as they are stated by the gentlemen from Washington, and this committee is bound to conclude that the Pension Committee gave the most liberal benefit of the doubt to the widow. Having done that, the gentleman from Washington comes forward now and asks us not only to solve the doubt in favor of the widow, but to make it an absolute fact, and give her the amount that the general law would have given her.

Now, what are the facts in the case as to this bill for the relief of the widow of Fred T. Briggs? He was a first lieutenant of Company E of the First Regiment of Washington Infantry, and was mustered out as adjutant of the regiment, with field and staff, November 1, 1899. He died October 27, 1901, about two years after he was discharged from the service. His widow made application to the Pension Bureau, and her claim was rejected upon the ground, as the widow stated in her application, that "he had destroyed himself by a revolver in his own hands," committed suicide two years after he was discharged from the service.

The Pension Bureau decided against the application of the widow, and would not allow a pension because he had killed himself with his own hands and his death was not brought about by service in the Army nor was it the result of service in the Army. It was claimed that he had nervous prostration, diarrhea, and rheumatism. Now, the facts as disclosed before this Pension Committee were that he was a telegraph operator and freight agent for two years from the time that he was discharged until he died. He never called in a doctor, and there has never been any proof that a doctor was in the case or was called in.

These are substantially the facts about the case, and, considering the helpless condition of the widow and four children, I was one of those, as I have always been in pension matters, liberally disposed to aid and help them in any way I could, and I moved to amend by fixing the amount at $12. It was done by the committee. Now the gentleman complains and says we ought to have made it $17. That is not right. He refers to a case of one Hill that the committee had, as he alleges, acted on differently from the rule as I have stated it.

Now, the facts about the Hill case, where we allowed $25, was that he was in the service from 1877 to 1898. I will not enter upon a full presentation of all the facts in the Hill case, but they are absolutely different from the facts of this case; no parallel whatever between them. I contend in this case that the committee has been extremely liberal to this widow; that we have given her $12 and to each one of the children under 16 years of age $2 apiece, making $18. We do not think the bill ought to be disturbed as amended by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining of the action of the committee. I know that the committee deals liberally with applicants for pensions, and I approve of the policy which the committee has adopted toward these bills in general. I know that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] is one of the fairest and most just men on this committee. I know he is doing exactly what he thinks is right, and I do not complain at his course. I know personally all of these matters and have a personal acquaintance with this applicant and of the deceased, and that may explain to some extent the interest I have in the matter.

Now, in reference to the service in the last case to which the gentleman refers, it also appears in the testimony that Lieutenant Briggs also served five years in the Regular Army before he served in the Philippines in active service. The gentleman says that he was not attended by a physician. That is true. He told me he would not have a physician. Why? Because he considered his case absolutely hopeless and the man knew and realized his condition. He felt that a doctor could do him no good, and it is true that he did not consult a physician. It seems to me the additional affidavit that has been presented to this committee here reinforces the affidavits I have already presented to the committee which reported this bill, and it seems to me it warrants the committee in not insisting too strenuously upon cutting this widow out of an additional $5 which the general law would give to her as the widow of a first lieutenant.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The affidavit was not from a doctor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; I admit that he never sent for a physician. He had no hope of relief, and I submit that this amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of passing a resolution calling upon the President for the return of a bill, I move that the committee do now rise temporarily. There is a mistake in the bill which needs to be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the question before the committee is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Very well; I will wait.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington to the committee amendment that the amount of this pension be increased from $12 to $17 per month.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama) there were—24 ayes and 2 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise temporarily.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. LACEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry private pension bills, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FUTURE OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I desire to present an article from Mr. Charles Denby, member of the first Philippine Commission, entitled "Future of the Philippines," being a reprint from the Chicago Daily News of March 28, 1902, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas submits an article from Mr. Denby, printed in a Chicago paper, with a request that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The article referred to is as follows:

[Reprint from Chicago Daily News, March 28, 1902. By ex-Minister Denby.]

FUTURE OF THE PHILIPPINES.

The burning question as to what shall be the future of the Philippines seems as far from settlement as it was when our complications with those islands first began nearly four years ago. Recent discussions in Congress indicate that leading Republicans are losing heart before the energetic attack of their Democratic colleagues. Some, like Senator SPOONER, have openly announced that we should not hold the islands permanently, but should educate the people and give them independence. Sometimes to this declaration is attached the absurd postulate of maintaining a protectorate, even after autonomy is granted. In modern history the first step to agglutination is the establishment by a strong government of a protectorate over a weak one. France has a protectorate over Tonquin and Anam, but no diplomatist is so silly as to imagine that it will ever give up its hold on those countries. England permits the native rulers still to play at government in India, but they are tools in the hands of the British residents, who absolutely control their exercise of governmental powers. Our new theorists are putting the cart before the horse. Elsewhere in the world a protectorate comes first. With us the new idea is to prepare nationalities for independence, and then exercise a protectorate over them—a policy which is, of course, nonsense. The notion is a makeshift. It is the recoiling of weak and irresolute men before the bold attacks of more audacious statesmen.

The time has come for us to outline the course of policy that we intend to pursue toward the Philippines. We have been groping in darkness for four years, afraid to comply with the treaty of Paris, which requires that Congress shall determine the status of the Filipinos; afraid to say anything touching this momentous subject, except that the military with the "mailed fist" shall be supreme. The result has been that we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars and sacrificed tens of thousands of valuable lives uselessly and needlessly. No man who knows anything about the Philippines doubts that if Congress were to declare to-day that the Philippines shall be independent as soon as their people are fit to maintain and carry on an independent government the troubles in that distracted region would cease to-morrow. If, therefore, our real and honest purpose is to give autonomy to the islands as soon as the people develop sufficient capacity to govern themselves, the declaration of that purpose should be immediately made. There can be no object in holding it back which is conducive to the general welfare of our country. Congress has forborne to express any opinion on the subject, but many of its members, Republicans and Democrats, have openly declared that we should not hold the islands permanently.

The pending Philippine bill has been amended so as to provide that when it shall have been certified to the President that the insurrection has ceased and peace has been established there shall be a general election of delegates to a species of legislature which is to be known as the Philippine assembly. The delegates so elected are to constitute a lower house, and the members of the Commission are to form a senate. After this election the legislative powers of the Commission are to cease, except so far as the Moros and other noncivilized tribes are concerned. This plan is contingent on the happening of an event which may not occur for some years, and, if present conditions continue, may never occur—the pacification of the islands. It conduces very little toward that end. It settles nothing as to the future of the Filipinos. It does not promise independence nor does it affirm permanent control. It will please nobody. The Filipino who opposes us and who demands independence will surely claim that this plan embodies an intention on our part to hold the islands, and his antagonism will be augmented, while the native who is inclined to favor us will regard it as a premium offered to continue active hostility. As civil government is not to come until peace ensues, it will be greatly delayed, of course.

Accompanying this plan also there is no statement of the all-important fact as to whether such a government is to be temporary or permanent. The status of the natives, whether it is to be colonial or territorial, is not fixed. There is no promise to the native who is inclined to favor us that our rule will be permanent. The plan decided on leaves this question in doubt, and the friendly native does not avow his real sentiment lest we should withdraw from the islands and leave him in the power of the hostile Filipino. Pacification can scarcely be hoped for under such circumstances. How can we ask the natives to come over to us unless we openly declare to them what our purpose is in holding their country? Under the recent decisions of the Supreme Court the Executive claims absolute sovereignty and dominion over the Philippines. The Spooner resolution emphasizes this claim. As long as Congress fails to provide a form of government necessarily the Executive must treat the islands as conquered territory and subject to its will. It must put down any insurrection and make military rule supreme. It is difficult to recognize the existence of a civil commission alongside of the military authorities and acting independently of them. All through the term of the first and the second commissions antagonism has existed between the civil and the military representatives. Even the civil commission reports to the Secretary of War and is responsible to him. The laws enacted by the Taft Commission savor greatly of military orders. The enactment against sedition might well have emanated from a supreme military commander.

I am not disputing the necessity of harsh and repressive laws. In the incongruous and uncertain condition in which we are involved severity is probably necessary to repress disorder. What may be reasonably complained of is that nothing serious has been done hitherto toward establishing a civil government, and the reason which underlies this failure to act is the deplorable cause of existing troubles. The reason is that Congress has not determined whether the Philippines should be permanently held or not. So long as this question remains in doubt there can be no peace in the islands. Recall the conditions under which we went there. Remember that Dewey took Aguinaldo in a man-of-war to Cavite; that he landed that person in the boats of his fleet; that he gave him arms and license to attack the Spaniards; that he turned over Spanish prisoners to him; that he regarded him not as an ally, but as efficient to fight the common enemy.

The treaty was made in December, 1898, and ratified in February, 1899, and from May, 1898, down to the present time Congress has not vouchsafed one word to the Filipinos as to what their future is to be. Nothing has been done to encourage the friendly Filipinos to stand by us or to remove from the mind of the hostile Filipino the ingrained idea that independence is to be granted. Nearly half the orators in the United States put in their days and nights in uttering fervid and splendid declamation to the effect that we are worse than England was; that we are tyrants, robbers, and oppressors; that we are violating all human and divine laws, including our own Constitution and every line in the Bible. Except in the days of antislavery agitation such oratory was never heard before, and, singularly enough, it comes now largely from those who occupied the opposite position when slavery was the issue. On the other side, the meek exponent of the existing policy gets up and shows how we are establishing schools; how we are starting municipal governments; how we are improving physical conditions; how we are going to elevate and instruct the poor, downtrodden Filipino, but he does not say one word as to what form of government he is going to give him. All these benefactions are well enough, but in the present condition of the Filipino mind one whiff of independence would outvalue them all.

Are there any original expansionists left in the country? Are there any men who believe that the Philippines would constitute a valuable portion of our territory? Are there any men who are looking to the expansion of our trade? Are there any men who do not believe that sugar and tobacco interests should rule 75,000,000 people? Is there nobody left who can rise above the selfish considerations of a tariff or a trust? Is there anybody who thinks that it is not important to anyone except the tobacco smoker that his cigars may be purchased 1 cent a hundred cheaper than now? Does all the world, which once so largely favored expansion, now agree that the question of our power and duty to collect a tariff on sugar and bananas is the one great question before us? Is there nobody in this country that has formed an opinion as to whether we should hold the Philippines or not? If such a person exists, is he too timid to express his opinion, and if so, why? Certainly while McKinley lived there was no evasion of the question. He it was who asked, "Who will tear down the flag?" and to this question the country responded by giving him an overwhelming majority. Particularly in the West, which best understands this question, were the majorities great.

We must do something to make the world believe that we are in earnest in our mission in the Philippines. We must cease the aimless slaughter of human beings. If we are mad, we must have some method in our madness. After four years of killing human beings we must at least tell the survivors why we have been killing their fellows. We are in a fair way to spend in the Philippines enough money to pay the national debt. We must tell the taxpayer what this expenditure is for, what its object is, what we expect to accomplish by the sweat and the toil which make it possible to spend this money. We must tell the foreign powers whether they may reckon on treating in a year or two with an independent nation or whether our flag will still fly over Manila. We must let our Christian people know whether or not it is prudent to send bishops and ministers, Protestant churches, and societies to the Philippines. We must let our merchants know our plan, so that they may conduct their business wisely. The miner, the wood sawyer, the shipbuilder, are waiting to know whether they can invest safely their capital and their brains in the Philippines. All this knowledge is cut out and excluded. No American can to-day impart any information as to our intentions toward the islands. We have learned rapidly from imperial powers the art of throwing all responsibility on the military, and no German can boast louder than we do of the "mailed fist."

This quietude, this self-abnegation of the exercise of plain powers, this patent dissimulation of real intention—if such exists—is not worthy of our nation or honorable to our people.

What Congress should do in the matter of the Philippines seems so plain that no man ought to fail to see it.

It should do what the first Philippine Commission earnestly recommended. It should establish a Territorial government for the islands. This policy would take the Constitution thither, and why not? Are Americans afraid of their Constitution? Under it we have ruled Territories for a hundred years, and our power over them was never disputed. As we expand our Territorial system goes forward. We have had it in New Mexico, Hawaii, Oklahoma, and Porto Rico, and we are soon to have it in Alaska, the Danish islands, and the Indian Territory. Such a tutelage may last a hundred years, and what if it does? It may result in building up new States in the Tropics, but we will control that question. We can not tell what the future may develop. It is possible that the whole system of annexation of noncontiguous territory is an error; and if that be true, we will find it out and we will change our policy.

The insistent problem is, What is the best to do now? Almost nobody proposes to give the Philippines up instantly, on the moment. Almost everybody agrees that we must hold them for a certain period of time. The writer does not agree that we should hold them an hour longer than we can decently get rid of them, unless we are going to hold them permanently. The minute that we agree that they shall at any period hereafter be independent, that instant we should institute proceedings to let them go. All this talk about the capacity of the people for self-government is mostly without foundation. They are as capable of self-government as the Cubans are. After having been four years in contact with Americans they will be able to organize and maintain a republican government. But whether they are fully equipped for self-government or not is no business of ours if they are to be independent.

We could survive the loss of the Philippines. They are not absolutely essential to our happiness. It is the doubt, the misconception of our intentions, the horrors of the actual situation, which are profoundly agitating Americans. We can do away with all these troubles in two simple ways. The first is a resolution by Congress that we do not intend to hold the archipelago permanently; the second is the institution of a Territorial form of government.

In the latter event the islands would become a part of our soil: our Constitution and laws would follow the flag; peace would prevail. The constitutional orator would disappear; he would have nothing to talk about. It would be an accomplished fact that the Philippines belonged to us. Trouble would come, perhaps, as it came and endured for many a year with the Indians, but who doubts that we would overcome every obstacle to peace and quietness?

All that our people want to know in order to make the Philippines great, rich, and prosperous is that they will remain permanently ours. I defy the world to produce any cogent reason, disconnected with politics and trusts, why this information should be withheld.

CHARLES DENBY,

Member of the First Philippine Commission.

Mr. DRYDEN. I ask that the petition lie on the table, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
156 Fifth Avenue, New York, April 11, 1903.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, we would most earnestly request that in any bill passed by the Senate dealing with the problem of Chinese immigration the right of students, teachers, and preachers coming from China to study in colleges, universities, and other institutions in this land, having no intention to reside here or to enter into any competition with American labor, should be conceded and safeguarded. It is our fear lest the terms of the Mitchell and Kahn bills, while appearing to concede and protect this right, are liable to such misinterpretation as shall, on the other hand, quite annul it.

We beg leave to express our solicitude also lest any unnecessary severity in new legislation excluding the Chinese may react upon our own representatives—commercial and religious—in China. We recognize certain limits to representations from missionary societies in such matters, but we feel that we owe it to a class of Chinese, sure greatly to increase, to ask that they be not unduly hindered from coming to this country to acquire sympathy with our institutions and a better understanding of our Western life, in order to return to their own people for their uplifting and the general strengthening of relations of sympathy between them and the West. With regard to this class, and, indeed, with reference to some other classes, also, we would beg that the terms of any further legislation should not be more severe or exclusive than the terms of the so-called Geary law.

Very respectfully,

DARWIN R. JAMES,
Chairman Finance Committee.
ROBERT E. SPEER,
Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO MOUNTAINS FOREST RESERVE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. BURTON, was, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith Senate bill No. 4563, entitled "An act granting the Central Arizona Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes through the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, April 14, 1903.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2960, known as the Chinese-exclusion bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Ohio, who is entitled to the floor, will permit me for a moment, I have here a memorandum sent to me a few moments ago from the Chinese exclusion commission, "indicating some of the objectionable features of certain amendments proposed in the matter of Senate bill 2960, the Pacific coast bill for the exclusion of Chinese laborers," and requesting me either to have it printed as a Senate document or to have it inserted in the RECORD for the use of the Senate as soon as possible. I therefore request that it be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask who are the parties?

Mr. PENROSE. The Chinese-exclusion commission.

Mr. CULLOM. Who are they?

Mr. PENROSE. They are James H. Budd, James D. Phelan, Andrew Furuseth, Truxton Beale, and Edward J. Livernash.

Mr. CULLOM. Who appointed them?

Mr. PENROSE. They were commissioned by the governor of California and a popular convention of 1,000 accredited delegates. Their headquarters are at room 32, Post Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wanted to know who they were. I did not know but that it was some Government commission I had not heard of.

Mr. PENROSE. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the memorandum be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

Memorandum indicating some of the objectionable features of certain amendments proposed in the matter of Senate bill 2960, the Pacific coast bill for exclusion of Chinese laborers.

SECTION 2.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment strikes out words prohibiting immigration to our mainland of Chinese laborers who were in our insular territory when the same was acquired by the United States. It substitutes words restricting (under rules of statutory construction) the prohibition to Chinese laborers who have entered the islands since they became ours.

When Hawaii was acquired the group had a large Chinese population, so large that Congress deemed it prudent to forbid Hawaiian Chinese to migrate to our mainland. The amendment would enable the Hawaiian Chinese of that time to enter our mainland, for it would operate as a repeal of the existing prohibition.

When the Philippines were acquired they had a large Chinese population. Governor Taft said in his recent testimony before the Senate Committee on Immigration that at present there are between 150,000 and 250,000 Chinese of the full blood in the Philippines and a great number of Chinese of the mixed blood. At the time of acquisition of the archipelago there were among the inhabitants more than 1,000,000 persons who were Chinese or of Chinese descent. The amendment would enable this immense population to pour itself into Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the United States proper. Who, save heedless and unscrupulously selfish capitalists, desire a calamity like that?

Moreover, Chinese duplicity is such that if any Chinaman who was in Hawaii or the Philippines at the time of acquisition may freely enter our mainland territory, we will find it in practice virtually impossible to disprove false representations of time of coming to the islands.

The amendment, if adopted, will make the Philippine feature of the bill the emptiest sham, and the change will be directly and very seriously damaging to American labor.

If it be not the purpose to use the Philippines as a treasury of cheap labor on which capital may draw at pleasure in forcing our white labor to unhappy conditions of competition, the amendment will be killed.

SECTION 7.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment strikes out the words obliging the student to go home when his student days are over and the purpose for which he came hither has been accomplished.

There is no good reason for a change like that. The language of the section is the language of the present law, and that law has worked well in the case of students and should be preserved. That it is the language of the present law the reader will see by turning to page 159 of the printed report of the Chinese-exclusion hearings of the Senate Committee on Immigration. Who is asking that the present law be weakened?

SECTION 8.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment strikes out the words which express one of the most important features of established practice as to alleged merchants.

To fail to provide that the coming merchant must have done something more than announce an intention to enter mercantile business before he can pass into our territory would be fatal. The most ardent promoter of improper immigration from China could ask for nothing much better than this amendment.

Production of certificate frequently means nothing except that the applicant has fraudulently acquired the paper by perjured representations across the Pacific; production of the small sum of money essential to become a part owner in some little shop here may mean nothing more than that the Chinese Six Companies have made an advance for the express purpose of meeting the money requirement of the law. The only conclusive test is the actual arranging to become a merchant here. It is this actual test of which the amendment would deprive us.

Who is asking that the present practice be made more satisfactory to the Chinese Six Companies? Why should the present practice be modified in the dangerous way proposed?

PROPOSED NEW SECTION, TO FOLLOW SECTION 9.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment adds a section to enable representatives of Chinese commercial houses to come here.

Mr. DILLINGHAM admits that such representatives have no treaty right to come here. He wishes to go further than the treaty goes.

The amendment is so dangerous that it would come near to defeating the exclusion policy if adopted.

There are no Chinese "commercial representatives." Those who say there are do not understand the Chinese business system.

But the amendment would bring thousands of Chinese laborers to the front in the guise of "drummers."

There are hundreds of thousands of Chinese establishments which could qualify as jobbing institutions, for nearly every Chinese shop deals in wholesale as well as retail trade.

Is it not probable that great numbers of thrifty Chinese shopkeepers would multiply their revenues by certifying their quota of "commercial representatives?" Is it not probable that laborers would be glad to take their chance of creeping through our laws as "commercial representatives?"

We find it almost impossible to deal with the duplicity of the Chinamen in the matter of our present "merchant" provisions, carefully drawn though they have been. What could we do with a class having no need of a business place, no occasion for immediately available funds, no obligation to buy or to sell anything within any given time?

The Chinese system is one of branch houses on the selling side of the trade case. The bill provides easy and clear-cut facilities for entry of persons coming to establish branch mercantile establishments, big or little.

In the matter of purchase of American goods the Chinese system is one of buying of agents sent to them. They do not send out purchasing agents to any country whatever. The most cursory inquiry will show this statement to be strictly within the fact.

Why should we go shadow-chasing, and while doing so open a broad gate in our exclusion wall?

SECTION 11—AMENDMENT ON PAGE 16, PARAGRAPH 5.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment of the fifth paragraph of the section strikes out one of the primary features of the long-established law.

The words stricken out appear verbatim in section 7 of the act of September, 1888, and ever since the adoption of that statute have been a most valuable safeguard against issuance of return certificates to Chinese laborers not having the return qualifications called for by treaty.

The change makes the preliminary statement of the Chinaman to the officer at the applicant's place of residence conclusive of the right of the Chinaman to receive a return certificate. It does away with the power of the port officer to inquire—a power essential in very many cases if frauds are to be prevented.

It would be extremely imprudent to cut away any of the safeguards given by the present law. Those safeguards need strengthening, and certainly should not be weakened or destroyed.

SECTION 11—AMENDMENTS OF FINAL PARAGRAPH.

Some amendments of the final paragraph of this section have been accepted by the Committee on Immigration since the bill was reported; others have not.

It is sought to make Richford, Ogdensburg, Alburg, Portal, Neche, Pembina, St. Vincent, and Warroad—all places along the Canadian border—statutory ports for entry of Chinese immigrants.

It is sought also to make El Paso and Nogales—both on the Mexican border—statutory ports for entry of Chinese immigrants.

None of these places should be made a statutory port of entry as proposed. To make them such ports would be decidedly dangerous.

The final paragraph of the section is verbatim the present law. (See section 7 of the act of September, 1888.)

Never since the beginning of our exclusion policy has any place along the Canadian or the Mexican frontier been a statutory port of entry to Chinamen. The change it is sought to make is a radical departure from long-established law, and along a line full of perils. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Southern Pacific and Mexican Railway companies are eagerly seeking to have this departure; but the original proponents of the bill are strongly opposed to any change of the sort, and if such change be made it will be made in direct opposition to the expressed advice of the Bureau of Immigration, the Bureau charged with administration of our exclusion laws.

There have been extensive smuggling operations along the northern and southern borders of this country in the matter of Chinese laborers, and one of the exceedingly difficult tasks of the Government is the prevention of such smuggling.

It would be most unfortunate if, at a time when frauds are common and the situation full of dangers, comfort should be given offending agencies and corporations by giving statutory entry character to border villages.

At present the Treasury Department designates ports of entry along the border. The bill provides that the present practice shall continue. The exact language of the present law is preserved in this respect.

As the law stands border ports of entry, gaining their character by designation by the Treasury Department and not by the letter of the statute, are subject to be closed if abuses justify such action. This is a most desirable check and should be continued.

What possible excuse is there for weakening the present law in the matter of the borders?

The ports named in the statute and the bill as it was reported are seaports. Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts are dealt with.

Omission of inland places has from the beginning been the result of careful consideration. It has enabled the Treasury Department to gain for the country the advantages flowing from a consciousness on the part of Chinamen and railway concerns that if occasion demanded this or that border port could be closed just as easily as it had been opened.

In point of fact, every border place named in the amendments, one excepted, is now a port of entry for Chinamen, by virtue of Treasury regulations.

The railway corporations are not satisfied to have these villages simply ports of entry. They wish them beyond the reach of the Treasury control now authorized and which the bill seeks to continue.

Attention is invited to the following matter bearing on the smuggling operations the Treasury Department is trying to prevent.

Peculiarly important testimony on the transit frauds is afforded by the following statement of Mr. Lyman Mowry, a leading citizen of California, made on the 3d of last August, to Mr. James Dunn, inspector of Chinese at San Francisco, one of the Treasury Department's most trusted officers. The statement is submitted verbatim:

"Mr. DUNN. Knowing your very extended acquaintance with matters relating to the Chinese, especially the early history of the immigration of Chinese to Mexico, as well as later events in which the Government is interested, I have to request you to give us such information as you are prompted by friendly interest to give, and particularly to begin with the statement showing your knowledge of the earlier political aspects of the case.

"Mr. MOWRY. My first experience with the Chinese in Mexico was in 1890, when I went from San Francisco to the City of Mexico to make a contract to supply 8,000 Chinese laborers to the Tehuantepec Railroad. That road was a Government railroad, which was to run from Salina Cruz, on the Gulf of Tehuantepec, to the city of Coatzacoalcas, on the Gulf of Mexico.

"When I arrived in the City of Mexico, in the early part of 1890, there were but 20 Chinese living in the City of Mexico, and they were all from the province of Kwan Sai, in China. They were Chinese who had escaped from the island of Cuba, and from certain labor contracts upon which they had been taken from China to Cuba. These Chinese had intermarried with the Mexican people and were Mexican citizens.

"In the year 1890 I went from the City of Mexico to China to secure these 8,000 laborers. I discovered there that under the laws of Hongkong no Chinese laborers could be taken to Spanish America under contract.

"There were two shipments of Chinese made from Macao in that year, one by the German ship Amigo of 500 Chinese laborers, and the other by the steamship Independent (another German vessel) of 650. Those Chinese went to Salina Cruz, and after working four months the original contractor of the Mexican Government failed and these men scattered themselves all over the southern portion of Mexico. The same year I sent 40 men from San Francisco—Chinese—under fishing concession on the Gulf of California, with headquarters at Altata, in the State of Sonora, the port of entry to Culiacan, the capital city in the State of Sonora. That fishery was abandoned in about a year.

"On my return from China I again went to the City of Mexico and urged upon the officials there the necessity of a treaty between China and Mexico to secure immigration into the Republic. At that time there existed a Treasury order, made by Mr. Windom, Secretary of the Treasury, that no Chinese should pass through the port of San Francisco for Mexican ports. I went from the City of Mexico to Washington in the interest of the steamship companies, the railroad companies, and my own interest, to secure a modification of that order, and succeeded in procuring from Mr. Foster, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, a modification which permitted Chinese to pass through San Francisco, by water, for Salina Cruz and all points south, but no points north.

"At the request of the Chinese minister, Tsey Qui Ying, and the Mexican minister, Signor Romero, I prepared a draft of a treaty between the United Mexican States and the Empire of China, as a basis of negotiation, which has since resulted in the treaty that now exists between the two countries.

"I sent a considerable number of Chinese to Salina Cruz under that modification, but it was impossible to keep them in southern Mexico. Subsequently I made contracts with three distinct plantations to supply them with 500 Chinese laborers each, with wages at $1 a day (Mexican), and to be employed for three years on these plantations.

"It must be understood that in Mexico there is no way of enforcing a labor contract any more than there is in the United States. These contracts were to supply laborers in the southern part of the State of Vera Cruz, State of Oaxaca, and the State of Chiapas. The lands in question all belonged to American corporations; in fact, the Americans have secured vast tracts of land in those three States for the purpose of raising rubber, vanilla, coffee, sugar, and tobacco. There is needed at the present time on the plantations that are now in operation at least from 10,000 to 15,000 additional Chinese laborers. One of these corporations constructed, under my direction, proper houses for these laborers to live in, with proper kitchens, etc., with all necessary sanitary arrangements.

"I shipped to that corporation a large number of Chinese from Hongkong via San Francisco, by the Southern Pacific, Mexican Central, and Mexican International Railway companies, though not more than 20 ever reached the plantation. Although their fare was paid from Hongkong to the city of Vera Cruz, by water from Hongkong to San Francisco, and by rail to Vera Cruz, via the City of Mexico, we never succeeded in getting into the country, of the many hundreds that were shipped, over 20, and those 20 at the first opportunity left. My judgment is that they all came north to the United States.

"The inducement for these Chinese to come to the United States is the fact that all the Chinese that I shipped came from the province of Kwangtung, and all the Chinese in the United States came from the province of Kwangtung, and as the tribal relation exists among the Chinese in its very strongest form, and every Chinaman belongs to a tribe, and the tribesmen are all interested in one another, every Chinaman who comes to Mexico has some member of his tribe in the United States, and that member of the tribe is drawing his tribesmen into the United States.

"I have no doubt, from my experience with these people since 1890 in this immigration, that none of the Chinese that go to Mexico go there with the intention of remaining, except a very few who are engaged in mercantile transactions in that country and who act as boarding-house keepers, cooks, and waiters on the lines of the railroad companies leading out of the United States into the Republic of Mexico.

"Only last year I sent an agent to the city of Torreon, which is the junction of the two leading railroads out of the United States—the Mexican Central and the Mexican International—where I knew there were 200 or 300 Chinese waiting to get into the United States, and offered them, through this agent, employment for from three to five years on the plantations in Vera Cruz with wages at $1 per day and their transportation from Torreon to the plantations, and we offered to advance them money enough to pay their debts, as all of them were in debt to the boarding houses at Torreon. We did not get one passenger.

"There is no need of any Chinese laborers in northern Mexico, and this for many reasons.

"Beginning at the west, the State of Sonora is a desert in all its northern portion, and is only fitted for mining and grazing, except in a few small spots or oases. Same is the case with the State of Chihuahua, the next State, though Chihuahua is a much better grazing country than Sonora, but there is very little agricultural land in the State of Chihuahua excepting on the banks of the Rio Grande, where they take the water out for irrigation purposes.

"There is a railroad owned by the Southern Pacific Company (and connecting with the main line at Benson, Ariz.) running through the State of Sonora across the line at Nogales to the city of Guaymas, on the Gulf of California. Large numbers of Chinese pass through the port of San Francisco for Guaymas. There is very little employment for these Chinese, excepting fishing, on the gulf. Most of these Chinese return to the line and cross.

"The Mexican Central Railroad connects with the Southern Pacific at Ciudad Juarez, immediately opposite the city of El Paso, Tex. This road runs 1,235 miles south to the City of Mexico, going the whole length of the State of Chihuahua, but there is no employment for Chinese in Chihuahua, and there are a sufficient number of Mexican Indians to perform all the labor in the mines and in the grazing country without calling upon Chinamen.

"The wages are very much lower in northern Mexico than have been offered to these Chinese to work on the plantations in southern Mexico.

"The eating houses on the line of the Mexican Central Railway from the city of El Paso to the city of Torreon, in the eastern end of Durango, are kept by Chinese. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company owns a line which connects with its main line at Spofford, in Texas, and crosses the Rio Grande in the State of Coahuila at Eagle Pass, in Texas, on the Rio Grande. The city immediately opposite on the same river is Ciudad Porfirio Diaz. A large proportion of the Chinese who come to the port of San Francisco in transit for Mexico pass over this line. By an examination of the map it will be seen that this line from Eagle Pass, known as the Mexican International, runs through the State of Coahuila into the eastern end of Durango and crosses the Mexican Central at the city of Torreon, and from thence proceeds to the city of Durango.

"The State of Coahuila is exactly the same in character as the States of Chihuahua and Sonora, being fit only for grazing purposes—that is, there being in spots agricultural land, but the bulk of the land is fit only for grazing. There is no employment for Chinese in this State.

"A remarkable thing about the Chinese going into Mexico is the fact that such a large proportion of them should go by way of the Southern Pacific and the Mexican International, because these Chinese make a voyage of over 1,000 miles out of their way to get into Mexico, thus, to wit, the passage from El Paso by the Southern Pacific to Spofford, and by Spofford via Eagle Pass to Torreon, describing both sides of a right-angled triangle, when they might just as well take the hypotenuse through El Paso to Torreon by the Mexican Central.

"There is existing now, and has existed all this year, a contract between a Chinaman by the name of Ng Hok Fong, who was sent to China as my agent, to send Chinese to southern Mexico to work on plantations (he has ceased to be my agent for more than a year), by which he receives either fifteen or twenty dollars—I believe twenty—commission per head for all Chinese sent by him through the port of San Francisco to Mexico, and I am credibly informed that he has already sent, this year, 2,000 Chinese laborers under that contract, none of whom were destined for work on the plantations in southern Mexico."

SECTION 16.

Mr. DILLINGHAM'S amendment would be needlessly vexatious to the Chinese immigrant, and might lead to confusion at ports of arrival.

What would be gained for anyone by having the certificate in a foreign language as well as in English? And if translations happened to be defective, might there not be disputes prejudicial to the interest of the immigrant?

SECTION 26.

Mr. DILLINGHAM'S amendment strikes out language designed to carry into permanent form those primary Treasury practices affecting transit of Chinese laborers across our territory which experience has shown to be worth preserving and which are so primary as to be matter rather for statute than for Treasury rule. It further strikes out—beyond power of Treasury Department to cure by regulation—the system of contract checks on transit frauds, a system recommended by the Bureau of Immigration as a result of the large experience of the Government since the adoption of the Geary Act.

In this regard the following matter is quoted, illustrative of conditions along the borders:

[Henry M. Hoyt, Assistant Attorney-General of the United States.]

It will be proper to state the notorious experience of the Treasury Department. * * *

The Chinese who transship at San Francisco for Mexican or Central American ports, or who pass by rail through the country on their way to West Indian ports or to a final destination in the interior of Mexico, in many or most cases do not really know where they are going. They go in groups under a guidance or direction which disposes of them almost like animals—that is to say, notwithstanding alleged destinations and manifest lists, and even where they really go through to foreign territory, they are unshipped in batches at the first convenient port or station across the Mexican boundary. The border towns on the Mexican side are generally filled with large numbers of Chinese obviously waiting only for a favorable opportunity to enter this country. They do not seek work at these towns, and remain there idly in Chinese lodging houses and restaurants until a safe avenue of entrance to this country is opened. It is impossible to police effectively the entire stretch of that long frontier.

The port of Ensenada, in Lower California, about 40 miles below San Diego, was formerly a point where they disembarked in numbers, the border being conveniently near. Now, Guaymas, inside the Gulf of California (with a direct railroad line to Nogales, in Arizona), Mazatlan, and San Blas, farther down the Mexican coast, are the points where the sea transit often ends, whatever the asserted destination. While with Chihuahua, Saltillo, the City of Mexico, and other interior points as ostensible destinations, Chinese going by rail transit are unloaded at the first convenient station across the Mexican border, so that along the lines of travel, as at Eagle Pass, El Paso, and Nogales, there is a concentration, in the Mexican villages near the line, of Chinese awaiting an opportunity to enter this country.

The Chinamen themselves generally have no knowledge where they are going, and various unmistakable indications show that their only conception is that ultimately they will be landed in the United States by the various mysterious agencies who seem to guarantee this result.

This statement indicates the reason why the Treasury regulations provide for a strict scrutiny of identity, destination, and good faith to prevent the privilege of transit from being abused, as it undoubtedly is in many cases.

(Brief for the United States in case of Fok Young Yo v. United States, now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, pp. 13, 14, 15.)

[T. V. Powderly, Commissioner-General of Immigration.]

Gross frauds are perpetrated under cover of the transit privilege, not only along the Mexican border but along the Canadian border as well. There is urgent need of careful legislation on the subject. (Testimony given before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, February 3, 1902.)

[Thomas F. Turner, special agent of the United States Industrial Commission.]

As already stated, large numbers of Chinese * * * come into the United States every year from Canada. The line of frontier is so extensive that it is next to impossible to police it effectively. I think, however, that if the Government were to guard more carefully the railway lines operating over the border, the number of coolies who enter the United States upon those lines would be greatly reduced.

Hundreds of Chinese immigrants who are denied landing at Seattle and San Francisco secure passage to some Mexican port, usually to Ensenada, from which points they work their way over the Mexican border into the United States. (Report of official investigation made for the Industrial Commission, 1899, 1900.)

SECTION 28.

Offending transportation companies responsible for unloading on us Chinese immigrants having no right to enter the United States do not always see to it that Chinamen given over to them actually are deported. Some of the Chinamen who should be returned to China are suffered to avoid that experience.

There should be power in the Treasury Department to discipline the negligent companies by electing to effect return of Chinamen by lines not offending, charging the cost against the negligent concerns. Such a power would rarely need to be exercised. Its existence would kill the grievance.

Mr. GALLINGER's amendment prevents the desirable vesting of authority.

SECTION 39.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment strikes out the provision prohibiting the employment on American ships of Chinese persons not entitled to enter the United States.

In support of the provision it is sought to have stricken from the bill the following matter is quoted from a memorandum put forth by the American Federation of Labor, the International Seamen's Union of America, the various unions of American marine firemen, the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Order of Railway Telegraphers, and the Chinese Exclusion Commission of California:

"Mr. Andrew Furuseth, secretary of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, and a representative of the International Seamen's Union of America, testified as follows before the Committee on Immigration, Senate of the United States, February 4, 1902:

"We find that the stepmotherly manner in which seamen have been treated in the past has not induced the American boy to seek the sea for a living, and we therefore ask that we may now receive the benefit of such protection as you shall choose to give to other workers. We find it impossible to compete with the Chinese in any trade wherein they enter. They simply absorb the trade and drive us out, and where, as in the trade in question [that of the seamen], they are assisted by such legislation as we have, both in a positive and negative way, they will man every American steamer that now plies or shall hereafter ply between railroad terminals on the Pacific coast and the Orient. * * * They are as a rule docile and attentive. They do not criticize among themselves any orders given, and if they do, it is not understood. They yield that ready obedience to, and apparent respect for, superiors, which gradually becomes pleasing even to strong, well-balanced men. * * * Sailors of Chinese blood may be had in Hongkong in practically unlimited numbers at $15 Mexican per month, and firemen or stokers at $18 per month, Mexican. This means, respectively, $7.50 and $9 in gold.

"The wages which would be paid to sailors if they were hired on the Pacific coast would be at least $25 gold—more likely $30 gold—being four times the amount paid to Chinese in Hongkong. A vessel would not carry as many whites as she does Chinese, but the difference in a year would probably be between $30,000 and $40,000 gold; a sum, surely, sufficient to determine the choice if the choice be left with the shipowner. * * * I do not think, gentlemen, that it would be safe to go on in the way you have been going. I do not think it is safe to put your merchant marine of the Pacific into the keeping of the Chinese, and unless you adopt some law that will give it to the whites, there is where it will go." (Chinese-Exclusion Hearings, Sen. Com. on Immigration, pp. 242-257.)

"In the course of his testimony before the Senate committee Mr. Furuseth stated that at present the trans-Pacific steamship companies controlling vessels running between oriental ports and transcontinental-railway terminals in the Pacific States employ Chinese exclusively as sailors, stokers, cooks, stewards, and waiters.

"During the recent Chinese-exclusion hearings before the same committee one of the trans-Pacific steamship corporations interested in this matter—the Pacific Mail Company—produced as a witness Capt. William B. Seabury, for thirty years in its service as a shipmaster on the Pacific. From his testimony, given on February 15, 1902 (Chinese-Exclusion Hearings, Senate Committee on Immigration, pp. 360-367), these statements are summarized:

"1. Chinese are capable seamen under ordinary conditions, and because of their temperance and servility are preferred by Captain Seabury to white seamen.

"2. There is no difficulty of obtaining an abundance of them in ports of China or at Hongkong, and the wage of sailors or firemen is about one-fourth the wage of white sailors or firemen shipped in Pacific-coast ports.

"3. Trans-Pacific liners plying between the Pacific States and the Orient employ exclusively Chinese as sailors, stokers, cooks, stewards, and waiters.

"4. Not only are Chinese supplanting the Caucasians as seamen on the Pacific, but they are encroaching on the Japanese of that sea, and are also successfully competing with the Lascars on the Indian Ocean.

"The testimony of Mr. Furuseth and Captain Seabury, concerning employment of Chinese seamen, is in line with a report of the United States Commissioner of Navigation. 'The crews of our own steamships plying to China and Japan,' says that officer, 'are almost wholly Chinese and Japanese, shipped before American consuls at foreign ports where the vessels enter and clear.' (Report Com. of Nav., 1898-99, p. 20.)

"However, not pursuing this subject so far as relates to the Atlantic trade, but returning to the case of the Pacific, there can be no claim that the wages paid to seamen employed aboard our ships is in excess of the wages paid by their competitors, for, as has been shown, our ships are employing the worst-paid seamen in the world—the Chinese.

"But, it is argued, if our ships on the Pacific are obliged to employ dearer labor, they will be so disadvantaged that they will be driven to adopt the British flag to escape the burden.

"The American vessels now employing Chinese seamen are owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company (San Francisco to Hongkong) and the Northern Pacific Steamship Company (Tacoma to Hongkong). The Pacific Mail Steamship Company is controlled by the capitalists who control the Southern Pacific and Union Pacific railway systems. The Northern Pacific Steamship Company is controlled by the capitalists who control the Northern Pacific Railway system. The vessels of each of these companies are run in connection with railway terminals, so that the Harriman railroads have a through transportation line from New York to Hongkong and the Northern Pacific Railroad has steamship extension from its Tacoma terminal to Asia.

"It has been admitted that there is a considerable difference between the cost of operating a vessel with white seamen and the cost of operating the same vessel with yellow seamen; but the annual wage difference in the case of the companies named would be a trifle viewed in connection with the general outlay and income of the vast combinations of which the steamship concerns are only parts. No testimony has been produced showing that the difference would be crippling to either steamship corporation, even considered apart from railroad connections.

"There is no serious danger that any of the ships of the mentioned corporations would change their registry rather than hire white seamen. The navigation laws of the United States make it impossible for any vessel of foreign registry to engage in our 'coastwise' trade; and Hawaii and the Philippines fall within the 'coastwise' limits. The vessels carrying our flag have a monopoly of our freight and passenger business with Hawaii, and this will be true, also, of the Philippines. This immense advantage, and it will be increasingly important, should silence those who plead for Chinese labor as essential to keep our flag on ships trading to the Orient.

"Wherein, anyhow, is the nation advantaged by having the American flag borne by ships manned by Asiatics not eligible to citizenship? Unless a ship gives employment to our people and can be counted on in time of national peril to yield men for duty in our Navy, what does it matter to us whether she does or does not fly our flag?

"The statement that Caucasians can not endure the heat of stokeholes in our China trade is quite erroneous.

"The United States transports plying between San Francisco and Manila go nearer the equator than do our China liners, yet white men are employed on them as stokers and in other capacities. Even those transports which ply between the Atlantic coast and Manila via Suez carry white men in the stokeholes. The merchantmen plying between our Pacific coast and Australia cross the equator, as the Pacific Mail and Northern Pacific vessels never do, yet all of the Australian ships carry white men exclusively on deck and in stokeholes.

"So, too, all of our ships plying between San Francisco and Panama, though they pass through the great calm tract of the Pacific, a tract more deadly in heat than anything experienced in the China trade, carry white men only, not excluding the vessels owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. In the same way all the merchantmen plying between our Atlantic ports and the West Indies and South America carry white seamen as sailors and firemen.

"The sailors and marine firemen of this country are not only willing but eager for the work the majority of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs declares white men do not wish to perform. In proof of this the following resolutions are quoted:

"RESOLUTIONS.

"Whereas during the subsidy debate and also during the hearings on the Chinese-exclusion bill it has been stated in Congress that white firemen for reasons of health can not be employed in the fire-rooms of steamers trading in the Tropics; and

"Whereas this statement is being used to deprive us of the protection against Chinese competition; Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, the Firemen's Union of Philadelphia, call attention to the fact that we sail in vessels on the Gulf coast, to Central and South America, and in any vessels anywhere so long as we are wanted and paid; and

"Resolved, That in our opinion it is not a friendly act to deprive us of work and give it to the Chinese; and further

"Resolved, That it would be more frank and friendly to state the reason why Chinese are carried, it being known of all seafaring men that the wages of Chinese are $9, while we, as American firemen, insist upon about four times that amount; and further

"Resolved, That being good enough to fight under the flag for its honor, we ought to be good enough to make a living under it.

"Approved by regular meeting March 25, 1902.

"WILLIAM ROBERTSON, Chairman.
"HORACE ATKINSON, Secretary.

"RESOLUTIONS.

"Whereas Senator HANNA and Senator FRYE have stated that the heat in the stokeholds of steamers trading to the Orient is such that no white stokers can endure the same; and

"Whereas this statement appears to have been the cause of the Senate voting down the anti-Chinese amendment to the ship-subsidy bill; and

"Whereas the statement is without any foundation in fact, the truth being that white stokers go in the transports from this coast through the Suez, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean to the Philippines, and that white stokers go to the West Indies, Central and South America; Therefore,

"Resolved by the Marine Firemen's Union of New York in regular meeting assembled, That we repudiate the heat argument and the idea that it had any justification in any humanitarian concern for the health of the stokers or marine fireman; and

"Resolved, That we have been and are now willing to serve as stokers in those vessels and will gladly do the work now done by the Chinese; and

"Resolved, That we here urge upon Congress to give to us who go to sea the same protection from Chinese competition that it shall be willing to give to workers on land.

"WILLIAM MACQUEEN, Chairman.
"JAMES W. BIRD, Secretary.

"MARCH 25, 1902.

"RESOLUTIONS.

"Whereas the United States Senate in passing the ship-subsidy bill killed the seamen's amendment of said bill; and

"Whereas, in the argument which caused the elimination of said seamen's clause, the advocates of the subsidy bill stated that white men were unable to endure the heat of the Tropics; and

"Whereas we, the members of the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union, are now sailing in the ships of the Oceanic Company trading to Australia, in the United States Government transports running to Manila, and in the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's vessels trading to Panama, and are only too willing to accept employment in all vessels trading to any port on the Pacific; Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union, That we denounce the statements made and the arguments set forth in the United States Senate as misleading and not based upon facts, and assert that they can only be ascribed to ignorance of the true condition of the manning of some of the trans-Pacific lines running out of San Francisco; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senators PATTERSON and PENROSE, Representative KAHN, and others.

"PACIFIC COAST MARINE FIREMEN'S UNION,
"Per JOHN BELL, Secretary.

"SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., March 27, 1902."

Attention is also invited to the following quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 8, 1902:

"Mr. FAIRBANKS. Something has been said as to the inability to secure American seamen for the trans-Pacific service. I should like to have the Senator, if he can, give us some information upon that subject.

"Mr. PERKINS. The best answer I think I can make to the question is that there are a number of steamship companies running vessels out of San Francisco employing a large number of sailors, firemen, and coal passers which do not employ Chinese. I have myself for thirty years been connected with a steamship company employing from 1,500 to 3,000 men most of the time, and we never have employed, to my knowledge, a Chinaman during that period.

"As to vessels running into the Tropics, all of the United States transports now engaged in the service, plying between San Francisco and the Orient, the Philippine Islands, and Japan, have white coal passers, white stokers, and white firemen. Their whole crews are Caucasian.

"The ships plying to Central America from San Francisco and to the coast of Central America and Mexico, and German ships running down the coast of Central America to South America, all employ white firemen and white coal passers and white deck hands (sailors). The ships of the Oceanic Steamship Company, one of which runs every two weeks to New Zealand and Australia, run to Honolulu, across the equator, and go down through the Tropics. They all employ white men. The steamers running from San Francisco to Samoa, to the Fiji Islands, also employ all white men. It is the same way with vessels of our Navy.

"In this connection I will state that when there was under consideration the bill to promote American shipping interests I voted for the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] prohibiting the employment of Chinese upon those ships. I did it for the reason that I supported the bill, believing it would build up and resuscitate and again give to us the carrying of our own trade under the Stars and Stripes as we formerly had it. I believe the correct way to do that is to encourage and make honorable and elevate the dignity of the life of a sailor, and it requires some courage to be a good sailor man. It requires a good deal of courage to be a fireman or a coal passer, to go down into the hold of one of these ships and there toil for four, six, or eight hours during the twenty-four, or longer.

"I have always had quite as much admiration for the stoker who went down into the hold of the Merrimac and went into that famous blockade at Santiago as I did for the man who stood upon the bridge, and it was on my motion that Congress kindly recognized their bravery by giving each one of them a medal.

"Mr. PENROSE. I should like to interrogate the Senator from California.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

"Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

"Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether it is true or not that there is a sufficient supply of white sailors upon the Pacific slope, and whether white sailors can stand the Chinese climate in pursuit of their occupation?

"Mr. PERKINS. The same question has been asked by the senior Senator from Indiana, and I have been answering it in part.

"Mr. PENROSE. I beg pardon. I was not in the Chamber at the time.

"Mr. PERKINS. I have been credibly informed by the Firemen's Union of San Francisco that there are plenty of men to fill these positions. The question is one of wages. I believe it is worth something to be an American citizen. It is worth a great deal. It is worth a great deal to have the right to fly the Stars and Stripes at the peak, and our ships plying out of San Francisco or New York to any foreign port have certain rights and privileges which foreign ships do not have. An American ship sailing from San Francisco may carry freight and passengers to Honolulu, to the Philippine Islands, and then continue on her voyage to Japan and China.

"Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

"Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

"Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says it is worth something to be an American citizen. Will the Senator kindly inform the Senate what proportion of the sailors whom he says are of Caucasian blood on the ships that sail from San Francisco are American citizens?

"Mr. PERKINS. In the coasting trade it amounts to about 60 per cent.

"Mr. GALLINGER. How about the foreign trade?

"Mr. PERKINS. In the foreign trade it is less than 50 per cent—some forty-odd per cent.

"Mr. GALLINGER. So that half of these men are not American citizens?

"Mr. PERKINS. They are all capable of becoming American citizens. Many of them come here who are not citizens. They have their families in San Francisco or at Oakland, across the bay. They have their little cottages, many of them building them perhaps on the installment plan, and when they come back after a voyage to Australia or to the Orient they are greeted by their children and their wives. There they see the schoolhouse that they pay their taxes to build, and there they see the little church where their wives and children worship. Those people become good American citizens in time. If they are not American citizens their children surely are, and they have the pride and honor that attach to it.

"I took a deep interest when I first came to Congress in ascertaining the percentage of foreigners in our Navy. I found there was some 65 per cent of foreigners in the Navy. I had several interviews with the Secretary of the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and with their assistance we have established several naval training stations.

"We now have a number of vessels shipping landmen, who go off on training voyages. The result is that we have reduced the percentage of foreigners in the Navy from 65 to 41 or 42 per cent. We have been making splendid progress in the last five or ten years, and I hope and expect to live to see the American flag flying on ships as I once saw it, when a sailor boy sailing out of your own native State, Mr. President [Mr. FRYE in the chair], which we all honor and love, the dear old Pine Tree State, and which we felt much interest in going to see. Then the boy in the forecabin looked forward to the time when he would walk the deck and command the ship, and was just as sure of reaching it as daylight follows darkness.

"So I believe in building up the American merchant marine. I believe the best way is to encourage the American sailor. I would make him an honorable vocation, as it is, and when it is only a question of dollars and cents I would give the preference all the time to the American citizen, or the one who is capable of becoming an American citizen, sooner than I would to a Chinaman, who would work for a pittance and take that pittance to China."

SECTION 46.

Mr. PROCTOR's amendment adds words excepting from finality of Treasury ruling on application to enter the United States any person claiming a treaty right to enter.

Every Chinaman not a citizen of the United States who applies for admission to this country looks to the treaty of 1894 for his right to enter, so that the amendment must be designed to kill the section it amends.

The provision made by the section can not justly be deemed harsh. It has long been the law, and at present applies to all immigrants to the United States—Caucasians as well as Asiatics. Here is the text of the present law:

"In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of the appropriate immigration or customs officers, if adverse to the admission of such alien, shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury." (Sundry civil act of August 18, 1894; 28 Stat. L., 890.)

The constitutionality of this provision has been established by the Federal Supreme Court in the case of Lem Moon Sing, 158 U. S., 539.

To adopt the amendment would be to overwhelm our courts with Chinese cases needlessly, and would be to discriminate in favor of Chinese immigrants as against Caucasians. It can not be possible that it will be deemed prudent to weaken the present law in any such way.

SECTION 52.

Mr. DILLINGHAM's amendment, in effect, provides that Chinese persons of mixed blood who are natives of the Philippines shall be free to enter Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the United States proper.

The testimony before the Senate Committee on Immigration establishes that when the Philippines were annexed they contained a vast number of Chinese of the half blood, born in the archipelago.

For all practical purposes the Chinaman of the half blood is as dangerous to American labor as the Chinaman of the full blood, just as the mulatto compares with the negro of the full blood.

What is more, Chinese deceptiveness is such that if a Chinaman of mixed blood may come from the Philippines into Hawaii, Porto Rico, or our mainland territory, only those Chinamen will be of the full blood who do not wish to leave the archipelago. It would be in practice impossible for our Treasury officers to disprove the assertion of an applicant that he had in him a strain not Chinese.

To adopt the amendment would be to make the Philippine features of the bill of no value, so far as they are intended to prohibit locomotion of Chinamen from the Philippines to other portions of our territory.

THE PLATT SUBSTITUTE.

The amendment offered by Mr. PLATT has these defects:

(1) It does not carry forward, as it appears to carry forward, the statutory provisions now being enforced. It carries forward only so much of the present exclusion system as is valid. There are pending in the Supreme Court of the United States five exceedingly important cases, in which the validity of nearly all of our present exclusion provisions is directly assailed. It is the belief of the best lawyers in the country that in at least two of these five cases the court will have to hold against the laws assailed.

In this connection the following quotation is made from a brief filed with the Senate Committee on Immigration during the recent Chinese-exclusion hearings:

"Now, in order to accomplish what we are accomplishing in excluding undesirable Chinese immigrants we are (as the foregoing citations show) relying upon a part of the act of Congress of 1882, a part of the act of Congress of 1884, practically all of the act of Congress of September, 1888 (the Scott Act), a part of the act of Congress of 1892 (the Geary Act), all of the act of Congress of 1893, the convention of 1894, and numerous Treasury rules and regulations.

"In order to continue to do that which we have been doing we must hold the laws and regulations we are now treating as valid.

"But the validity of a large part of those laws and regulations is questioned in five important test cases pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

"As the citations abundantly prove, if the Scott Act, the act of September, 1888, is not valid, then a considerable and vital part of our exclusion system must fall unless the Congress shall come to the rescue by express reenactment avoiding the danger points.

"And it is to-day being claimed before the Federal Supreme Court that no part of the Scott Act ever took effect, and that such act must be stricken from the living body of exclusion laws.

"In the case of Fok Yung Yo v. The United States of America, on appeal from the district court of the United States of the northern district of California, this claim of invalidity of the Scott Act is made; and it is also made in the case of Lee Gon Yung v. The United States, on appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California.

"Mr. Maxwell Evarts is counsel for the appellant in each of these cases, and as such counsel is seeking to tear down that large portion of our present bulwark against the Chinese which is known as the Scott Act, notwithstanding that before committees of the Congress he is representing that the present bulwark should be maintained.

"In these two cases the following claim is made, the quotation being verbatim from the brief filed by Mr. Evarts in the Fok Yung Yo case:

"This act of Congress of 1888 was passed subject to the ratification of the then pending treaty between the United States and China. This treaty was never ratified. The act therefore never took effect."

"It would not be surprising to find that in this claim Mr. Evarts is right. The opening section of the Scott Act is: 'That from and after the date of the exchange of ratifications of the pending treaty between the United States of America and his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China, signed on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1888, it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person, whether a subject of China or of any other power, to enter the United States except as hereinafter provided.'

"The treaty referred to in this opening section of the Scott Act was never ratified by China, and has never gone into effect. The treaty of 1880 ran along until the signing of the treaty of 1894.

"In a letter written by the present Attorney-General of the United States to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date October 10, 1901, this opinion is expressed: 'The act of September 13, 1888, was passed with reference to the treaty between the United States and China then pending, and it has always been doubtful whether any part of this act took effect. Section 1 made it unlawful, after the ratification of that treaty, for any Chinese person to enter the United States "except as hereinafter provided." That would seem to make the entire act dependent upon the treaty.'

"If the Scott Act is not valid, is in truth dead, then adoption of any bill whose general terms renew the living law can not avail to give us the benefit of that dead law which we are now treating as valid.

"Just as Mr. Evarts is assailing the exclusion laws from one quarter, so those laws are assailed from another quarter. In three pending cases the whole fabric of our present exclusion system is attacked in the Supreme Court of the United States. These cases are entitled as follows: The United States v. Lee Yen Tai, Chin Bak Yan v. The United States, Chin Ying v. The United States. The first of these three cases is upon certificate of the United States circuit court of appeals for the second circuit; the others are on appeal from the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York. A suggestion of their importance is contained in these paragraphs taken from a motion to advance, made in January of this year in the Supreme Court by the Solicitor-General of the United States:

"The Solicitor-General respectfully moves that this cause be advanced and assigned for argument at an early day for the following reasons:

"1. The question is fundamental and goes to the validity of most of the existing Chinese-exclusion laws. To deny their validity is a startling proposition. The Government believes it to be manifestly untenable. Whether or not well founded, the doubt should be resolved promptly, in order that the laws may be rightly understood and enforced."

"What appears to be essential, in order to defeat the litigants now seeking to destroy the efficacy of our exclusion system, is that the Congress codify all of the present statutory and Treasury provisions which are worth preserving and give to such codification the sanction of direct legislative approval."

The objections are not met by a provision giving the Secretary of the Treasury power to frame regulations. The provision of law now authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to frame regulations, and which is under fire, is only one of numerous provisions the opponents of our exclusion system are attacking in the Supreme Court.

(2) The amendment ignores the problems presented by the Philippines.

(3) The amendment ignores the failure of the present law to protect the American seaman from competition with Chinamen.

(4) The amendment ignores the following considerations: The present exclusion laws are badly scattered, and for the Congress to extend them, as under the Platt amendment, would be for the Congress to do an important work negligently. The existing laws are living provisions of the acts of Congress of 1882, 1884, 1888, 1892, and 1893, and the treaty of 1894, as also portions of the statute providing a government for Hawaii, and portions of the sundry civil acts of 1894 and 1900. It would be at least orderly and becoming for the Congress to cut away all the dead sections of the various statutes and gather together in one living body the laws touching the immigration of Chinese.

There are cogent reasons, moreover, for preserving not only the statutory provisions which have given us a somewhat satisfactory exclusion system, but also the most important features of the body of Treasury practice which has grown up under those statutory provisions. We have had in the last twenty years some very uncomfortable experience with Secretaries of the Treasury, and the present practice, the present rules and regulations, which time has demonstrated to be wise and valuable, should not be left at the mercy of an unknown future. Who shall say what may be the will or the opinions of the gentlemen who, during the next several years, may in the Treasury Department of our Government, or in a department of commerce, have the framing of exclusion rules and regulations?

(5) The amendment ignores the defects discovered in the present laws since 1893.

Mr. FORAKER. Was it the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the memorandum be printed in the RECORD or printed as a document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it be printed in the RECORD, the Senator asked.

Mr. PENROSE. I only want it in such shape as will be most convenient for Senators during the next two days, and I assume that it will be most convenient to be found in the RECORD.

Mr. FORAKER. It will be found conveniently there. I suggest that it be printed also as a document, and that will be still more convenient.

Mr. PENROSE. I will accept the Senator's suggestion, if he thinks that better, and have it printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks that the same paper be also printed as a document. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. Under the notice given, I suppose I have the right, under the rules of the Senate, to the floor at this time. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN], who also gave notice that he would desire to address the Senate to-day, has requested that I give him precedence because of a necessity he is under to leave the city on an early train this afternoon, and therefore I yield to him, but with the understanding, which I hope the Senate will allow me, that I shall follow him.

Mr. McLAURIN of South Carolina. Mr. President, it was not my intention to make any formal remarks on a measure which has already been so ably and fully discussed on both sides. But so little has been said regarding an aspect of the question, which affects so intimately the interests of my section, that upon reflection I have finally considered it my duty to ask the attention of the Senate for a short time to this point—which is the trade aspect, or commercial phase, of the question at issue.

It may be, Mr. President, as has been so frequently intimated in certain quarters, that to look at this Chinese-exclusion matter from the commercial standpoint is to consider it in the lowest and narrowest sense. It may be that considerations of national commercial prosperity should be made subordinate to considerations of sentiment. Undoubtedly they should be subordinated to considerations of national honor. The honor of the country, like the honor of the individual, is the first and highest consideration of all. It is inconceivable to me that any honorable nation—least of all the United States of America—should surrender its integrity by deliberately adopting policies and enacting laws in violation of its own sworn compact and treaty with any other nation, and that, too, during a period of profound peace and amity, without any provoking cause therefor on the part of the other nation. That the proposed bill does involve many and serious infractions of our treaty with China has been so clearly and abundantly proven already by demonstrations from several distinguished Senators, that I do not consider myself justified in making more than this passing allusion to that branch of the subject.

As to the importance of effecting a complete exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country, there is, I suppose, no difference of opinion here, and therefore no occasion for argument. The question then turns upon the comparative merits of the two plans of exclusion, namely, the plan now being followed and the plan proposed by the new bill. No doubt exclusion would be effected by the proposed law, but exclusion is also satisfactorily effected by the present law. Why, then, should we change, unless we can derive some benefit from the proposed new law that we fail to derive from the existing law?

The United States would derive no benefit from the proposed change, Mr. President, but, on the contrary, a positive and serious injury. The pending bill is calculated, by its restrictive action and inimical spirit, to kill our trade with China.

This is a consideration of vital importance to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, to the whole South, and in an almost equal degree to New England, New York, and, indeed, the entire country. If this Chinese trade could not be secured by us except at the price of coolly immigration I would be the last man to raise my voice in behalf of it. The South has had quite enough of "race issue," as it is, and heaven forbid that another race issue should be precipitated upon the South, or the North either, by any further irruption of a Mongolian nature!

But as the exclusion of Chinese laborers is assured under both measures—the present law and the new measure under discussion—and as the former nourishes our trade with China, while the latter would check and stunt if not ruin it, why should we hesitate to express our preference for a continuance of the existing law?

Speaking for South Carolina, Mr. President, I may safely say that South Carolina demands first of all that this country shall do its duty on a question of honor—that it shall maintain its integrity in the fulfillment of its treaty obligations; and, next, that this country shall so legislate as to secure fair play for all its sections and all its citizens alike—for rich and for poor, for the laborers on the Pacific coast and also for the laborers on the Atlantic coast, for the miners of California and also for the mill workers of South Carolina. Aye, fair play, too, for the Governments and respectable citizens of all foreign nations as well, including China. South Carolina does not want contract labor or coolly labor in this country, and would not tolerate it. Nobody wants it. It is out of the question—out of the calculation altogether. It will not be had under the present law or under the proposed law or under any other law, past, present, or future. But fair play we ought to have and must have for all respectable labor, for all respectable business men and enterprises, and for all respectable Governments under the sun.

Now, is it fair play to the people of the South, just as they are beginning to prosper in manufacturing and commercial enterprises, after long years of trouble and privation, to tear down and crush their new enterprises, on the assumption that such a ruinous policy is necessary in order to keep out the Chinese, when in point of fact it is not at all necessary and the Chinese are being kept out by the existing law? That is the plain business proposition at the basis of the whole question.

Let us look at the matter a little more in detail.

South Carolina is now the second cotton-manufacturing State in the Union. The development of its cotton-mill industry has been without parallel in any other part of the United States. In 1890 there were 34 establishments in South Carolina devoted to this industry, representing a capital of $11,141,833, employing 8,071 wage earners, and turning out products valued at $9,800,798. In 1900 the number of establishments had increased to 80, the amount of capital to $39,258,946, the number of wage earners to 30,201, and the value of products to $29,723,919. While for the whole of the United States the average increase, for the decade, of capital employed in cotton manufactures was 32 per cent, that of South Carolina was 252 per cent. While the average increase in the number of wage earners was 31½ per cent, that of South Carolina was 274 per cent. While the average increase in the value of products was 26½ per cent, that of South Carolina was 203 per cent. The manufacture of cotton goods is now the most important industry of South Carolina, since it gives employment to 62.7 per cent of the wage earners employed in the State, and turns out 50.6 per cent of the total value of the manufactures produced in the State. The development of this industry, which was temporarily arrested by the Chinese troubles a year ago, has been vigorously resumed, and bids fair to proceed at such a pace that South Carolina, which has already passed Rhode Island, will in the next ten years take the place of Massachusetts as the foremost cotton-manufacturing State in the Union.

This brilliant prospect can be blighted—the prosperity of the South Carolina mills and the gaining of a livelihood by an army of 60,000 workers can be interrupted—in only one way, and that is by a shutting down of the export demand for American cotton cloth. That demand amounted in the first two months of the present calendar year to more than $6,000,000, and it is being maintained at a rate without example in the commercial history of the country, so that for the current fiscal year our exports of manufactured cottons will probably exceed in value $30,000,000, or fully $6,000,000 more than in 1900, the most prosperous of any of the preceding years. Of this export demand 60 per cent is represented by our sales to China, and it is on the continuance and increase of these sales that the prosperity of the cotton industry, not only of South Carolina but of the whole United States, absolutely depends.

That this fact is keenly appreciated in business circles in the North as well as in the South was strikingly demonstrated at the recent hearings before the Committee on Immigration, on which occasions there were present representatives of the cotton-manufacturing interests of both sections, and of many other commercial and business interests as well—men from the North like Messrs. Charles S. Hamlin, of the Boston Merchants' Association and Chamber of Commerce; Theophilus Parsons, president of the Arkwright Club of cotton manufacturers; P. Y. De Normandie, of the Laconia and Pepperell Mills of Maine; Clarence Cary, of the American China Development Company, which is now building a railroad in China; John Foord, Silas D. Webb, and other prominent business men; while from the South there were Mr. D. A. Tompkins, in behalf of the North Carolina cotton-mill owners, and from South Carolina a large and influential delegation, including Messrs. Ellison A. Smythe, of the Pelzer and Belton Mills; W. A. Courtenay, of the Courtenay Manufacturing Company; John B. Cleveland, of the Whitney Manufacturing Company; J. H. Montgomery, of the Pacolet and Spartan Mills; John C. Cary, of the Lockhart Mills, and T. J. Hickman, of the Graniteville Mills, representing, probably, at least one-half of the entire cotton-manufacturing interests of the State.

All of these representative business men bore witness that they were opposed to coolly immigration, and did not wish any legislation that would make exclusion less stringent; but that they objected to the proposed new legislation because, while it was not needed for the purposes of exclusion, it would necessarily subject reputable Chinese merchants and other business men to much personal inconvenience and annoyance, and would give them and their Government good cause for taking offense, so that the natural effect would be to greatly injure our trade relations with China and to retard if not to stop altogether the progress of that trade.

The assertion is often made on the opposite side of the question that China will continue to trade with us just the same no matter how we treat her. This assertion is as discourteous to China as it is untrue to the principles of human nature and to the recorded facts of history. Without multiplying illustrations we need only to go back a year or two to the recent Boxer disturbances to show what would probably happen in case of the passage of the pending bill. The testimony of Mr. Ellison A. Smythe, before the committee in one of the hearings that I have alluded to, is so important and clear on this point that I quote a few sentences of it here. Mr. Smythe said:

Largely the mill interest in the South is dependent on the export trade, and this is peculiarly so with the trade to China. This was very acutely felt during the depression incident to the war in China, which lasted about twelve months, in its effect on the Southern millers. I doubt if there was one Southern mill, or at least there were very few Southern mills, that during the fiscal year ending last July were able to show any profit at all on their business during the preceding twelve months, and most of them showed very considerable losses owing to the stagnation in trade, the piling up of their goods, and their inability to sell their products. And the efforts to get into other trades and to make other goods that were used in this country led to very fierce competition with the mills of the country that were built and that are devoted to the home trade. * * * If any additional restrictions are imposed upon the coming to this country of Chinese merchants it may lead to very disastrous results for the Southern manufacturers and cause very fierce competition between the mills in this country for our home trade, as there will be a large production that will either have to be sold at some price, made of some kind of goods to suit the home trade, or the mills will have to stand idle. It would lead—

And I invite the attention of my friends from New England to this language—

It would lead to very great competition between the mills of the South and the mills in New England for the home trade.

It may seem strange that the difference between profit and loss on an industry whose annual product is valued at $339,000,000 should hinge upon the retention of an export demand of $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 a year. But this is not mere guesswork; it is a fact which has been demonstrated by costly experience. What was the amount of the falling off in export business which, as stated by Mr. Smythe, the executive head of the great Pelzer group of mills in South Carolina, began to spell ruin for the cotton mills of the South and demoralization for the entire cotton textile market of the country? It was simply the difference between an export to China of $8,783,134 in the fiscal year 1900, and $4,552,534 in the fiscal year 1901. If a decrease in the export demand amounting to only a little more than $4,000,000 had the results which every cotton manufacturer knows to his cost it had a year ago, what might be expected from an interruption of the present very much larger volume of our exports to the Chinese Empire?

Col. James L. Orr, one of the most successful mill men in South Carolina, told me last night that the Piedmont Mills had averaged a net profit of $180,000 per year for eleven years, except during 1900, when, owing to the Boxer troubles, the profits dwindled to less than $12,000. I know personally of a number of mills which closed down and others that ran at a loss.

To illustrate this point I have prepared a table showing month by month during portions of the fiscal years 1901 and 1902, the exports of cotton cloth from the United States to China:

Here is a forcible illustration of the difference between a market practically closed and the same market reopened and expanding. In the first group of eight months, during the disturbances, we see our exports of cotton cloth to China dwindling suddenly from nearly $1,000,000 a month down to less than $25,000 a month, with a total for the whole eight months of less than a million and a half. In the second eight months, after the troubles had all been adjusted, we see the same exports amounting to from one to two millions a month, with a total of over ten millions for the whole eight months.

Now, it does not need a war in China to bring about a return of the conditions which so greatly affected our trade there during the fiscal year 1901 and which had so disastrous an influence on the entire cotton-manufacturing industry of the United States. You have only to accept the logical results of the policy toward China and the Chinese which is embodied in the provisions of the bill before you, to bring about a condition of commercial warfare between this country and its chief customer in the Orient, in the course of which the trade, of which I have given the returns, will shrink to, or below, the dimensions it had during the Boxer troubles of 1900. The statement has been made before a committee of the Senate and repeated here on this floor that we have nothing to fear from the retaliation of China, in any case. Let me quote to you on this point the testimony of possibly the largest exporter in this country of cotton domestics to China, Mr. Silas D. Webb, the president of the China and Japan Trading Company:

All business in China is done under a system of guilds, based very much on the lines of the Federation of Labor in the United States. No person can go into business in China without being a member of a guild, that is, into any business of importance. The guild is governed in such a way that if its members should take a notion that the Americans were insulting them, they would have a meeting quietly and state that they did not want to do any business with Americans, or handle American goods, and it would be utterly impossible for any business to be done.

We shall certainly do our best to provoke such action if we insist on placing such annoying and humiliating restrictions upon the entrance and business activity in the United States of Chinese merchants or students as would be resented by the citizens of the pettiest nation with which we have commercial intercourse. Our trade with Japan has been greatly furthered by the fact that so many Japanese students and merchants came here to investigate and carried home with them not only American ideas but also American wants, and so helped to create a market for our merchandise. We shall deliberately surrender any such advantage in regard to China if we turn over her mercantile representatives to our commercial rivals in Europe. If we persist in subjecting China to humiliating treatment, what ground could we have to complain if the Chinese Government in the negotiation of the pending commercial treaties should say to the United States: "You can not enjoy the benefit of the most-favored-nation clause in any new agreement touching your commerce with us, because you refuse to accord to our people the kind of treatment which the people of every other nation with which you have treaties demand and receive at your hands?" I do not see that we should have any just cause for protest if China were to place the same embargo on our merchants, students, and travelers visiting the Empire that we are now asked by the advocates of the pending bill to make perpetual in regard to hers.

Now, reverting to the conditions in the South, what would be the chief effect of a shut-down in the China trade and the consequent collapse of Southern cotton manufacturing? The first would be to glut the home market with cotton goods in a few weeks, and then to close up the mills. Who would be the chief sufferers? Not the mill owners, not the cotton growers, not the merchants and exporters, though all these would suffer much. The chief sufferers would be the operatives in the mills—the thousands of happy, busy, well-paid wage-earners now employed steadily in these mills and making a good living under agreeable and comfortable circumstances. These deserving operatives, most of whom have no other means of support and hardly any reserve funds, would be suddenly thrown out of employment, and who can measure the suffering that would ensue? In my own State the number of these operatives would reach perhaps 60,000, to say nothing of their families and the very many who would be injured directly or indirectly by their loss of work; but there would be hundreds of thousands besides, throughout the South, who would be compelled to suffer in like manner. The effect would be felt acutely and painfully in North Carolina, in Georgia, in Alabama—in all the States where cotton is grown or cotton goods are manufactured. The needs and rights of the laborers on the Pacific coast are entitled to be respected and defended, but when their principal demand can be satisfied by the present existing law, under which their Southern fellow-laborers can thrive, why should they insist on a new law which will serve their own purpose no better, and under which their Southern fellow-laborers so much poverty and misery.

The prosperity of the North is closely linked with the prosperity of the South. Southern prosperity reacts upon and increases Northern prosperity, and one of the most potent factors in the recent advance of the whole country in prosperity has been the wonderful increase of profitable and successful manufacturing and other business enterprises in the South. The official figures show that in 1880 the total value of the manufactures of the fourteen Southern States was $450,000,000; in 1890, $917,000,000; in 1900, $1,466,000,000. Here is an increase of more than 200 per cent in twenty years. In the specialty of cotton mills the increase has been still more extraordinary. In 1880 the capital invested in cotton mills in the South was $21,000,000, and the number of spindles in operation was 600,000. In 1890 the capital was $61,000,000, and the number of spindles 1,700,000; and in 1900 the capital was $150,000,000, and the number of spindles 6,000,000. These totals have, moreover, greatly increased since 1900. But with the enormous natural advantages and facilities of the South, with its cotton grown on the premises, so to speak; with its illimitable water power; and with inexhaustible supplies of coal and wood ready at hand; with its abundant labor supply; and with its unsurpassable climate, the rate of increase hitherto—great as it has been—would be as nothing compared with the rate of increase hereafter, provided that there is no interference with the export trade. The further rapid development of this cotton-manufacturing industry in the South is absolutely certain if we can but keep our control over the markets in the Orient. Otherwise, there would be no outlet for the goods manufactured—no reason for building new mills, and not sufficient market to keep the old mills going. For the three years past the production of cotton goods in the United States has exceeded consumption by 35 per cent, and as production is increasing more rapidly than population the importance of the China market is obvious. For, as pointed out by Mr. John C. Cary, of the Lockhart (South Carolina) Mills, in a recent number of the Manufacturers' Record, the Chinese-American trade is particularly reciprocal because we produce much that China needs and China produces much that America needs. Accordingly, it is especially important in our case that we should not enact laws calculated to impede our trade with China. Mr. Cary's argument is very clear and well worth reproducing here. He says:

The present exclusion act seems to be in a manner satisfactory to the Chinese Government, and is accomplishing its end. It also admits of friendly trade relations; and under it, with the treaty between this country and China, we have invaded a small, and indeed a very small, territory of China with our trade after hard and persistent efforts to introduce American goods, to the advantage of all classes of this country and to the detriment of none. Not one dollar of capital nor one arm of labor has been or will be injured by reason of this friendly intercourse, and why not encourage it by fair, just, and honorable laws? It is plain to all that we must have a foreign trade, and as China offers the greatest possibilities for our products, the manufacturer and tradesman naturally look to her for a market, but with irritating and exacting legislation by this country, how can we expect to extend our trade, or even hold the little we have? We can not expect our enemies to trade with us; therefore it is of the highest importance that we should be friends to China.

As Mr. Cary goes on to show, the question, so often asked, as to why the China trade should be considered so important, is very easily answered. So far as the cotton-goods market is concerned the answer is that the Southern cotton mills produce for the most part goods that are particularly adapted to the Chinese demand. The chief products of those mills, probably three-quarters of the whole, are coarse sheetings and drills, which are not particularly required by the European market but are exactly what the Chinese want. There is also considerable demand for them in Mexico and some of the South American countries, but the great market for them has been found in China. The products of our cotton mills are much preferred by the Chinese above the products of the English mills, and consequently the natural drift of the Chinese trade would be toward the United States in respect to cotton goods. As I have already pointed out, also the Southern mills if deprived of this foreign market for their coarse goods would be compelled to change over to a manufacture of finer goods for the home and European markets, with the result of competing ruinously with the home manufacturers and eventually letting that market become glutted.

Another important confirmation of the general position assumed and maintained in this argument is found in a paper recently read before the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association by Mr. William Whittam, jr., a prominent manufacturer of Woonsocket, R. I. Discussing the possibilities of trade expansion in cotton manufactures, he called attention to the importance of the fact that whereas the standard makes of American cotton fabrics can be sold to a limited extent in almost all foreign countries, the markets in which they can be disposed of in large volume are comparatively few, and the best of these are China and Mexico. He insisted with great force that the cotton trade of the world is as yet practically untouched by us and that it is manifestly our duty to do everything possible to enlarge our market for these goods instead of adopting policies for contracting what markets we already have. Mr. Whittam bore emphatic witness to the remarkable natural advantages of the South in cotton manufacture, saying that present conditions in the industrial centers of the South are more favorable for the remunerative manufacture of coarse, heavy cotton fabrics than they are in any other manufacturing country in the world.

Echoing his sentiment, I would inquire: "Need more be said of the importance of making the hundreds of millions of cotton-clad foreigners our customers?"

No, Mr. President, the pending bill is not drawn in the interests of the United States. Its operation, if enacted, would infallibly injure the country instead of benefiting it. It is claimed to have been framed for the relief and elevation of American labor. Instead of that it would unquestionably inflict enormous loss and distress upon American labor. Without conferring upon the working people of the Pacific coast any further advantages than they now possess it would take away from the operatives of the South much of the advantage that they have fairly won. It would likewise injuriously affect the business interests of the North, and, I believe, of the Pacific coast as well.

Imputing to my friends who advocate this measure all of the purity of purpose and honesty of intention that I claim for myself, I am still forced to conclude—after impartial study of the question—that the bill as it is presented for passage is faulty in conception, faulty in execution, faulty in deduction, faulty in logic, faulty in its premises and its conclusions. If this is too strongly put, I am at least sure that there is sufficient doubt as to the efficacy of this measure to accomplish its desired purpose and sufficient menace in the probable results of its unfairness to the great Empire of China to make wise its postponement and the postponement of any legislation upon this question until the expiration of the present treaty with China which embraces the existing exclusion law.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, on Saturday last the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] took occasion to speak of the necessity we are under in this body of acting by committees, primarily at least, in the investigation of all important questions; and he spoke of the respect that we are all under obligation to pay to our committees, their action, and their reports. He spoke with the disposition, as it seemed to me, to criticize all who are not able to fully agree with and support the action of the committee in this instance.

I want to say at the outset, Mr. President, that I recognize the propriety of all that the Senator has said, except only that part which is in the nature of criticism. It is true that we must act by committees, and it is true in this instance that we have a committee of able Senators, conscientious men, who have approached the consideration of this question, I have no doubt, conscientiously, and their report shows that they have labored zealously to arrive at what, in their judgment, is the legislation that should be enacted on this subject. I am always loath to differ from a committee, and especially such a committee; and yet, Mr. President, while loath to differ from a committee, there will come times when a Senator is unable to agree throughout, at least, with a committee. I am in that situation now.

I have no difference of opinion with the committee as to some important parts of this proposed legislation, but I have a very decided difference of opinion as to some of the provisions of the bill. My purpose here is not to differ unnecessarily with a committee—certainly not to obstruct the work of a committee, certainly not to criticize unnecessarily the work of a committee—but only to do my own duty according to my own conscientious judgment with respect to so important a subject after I have on my own account, as it is the duty of every Senator to do, carefully investigated it and reached a conclusion.

It is in that spirit, with a most profound respect for the committee, and with extreme regret that I cannot agree with the committee in every respect, that I want to express my differences of opinion so far as this measure gives rise to differences of opinion, and to give the reasons why I can not agree with the committee throughout.

At the outset, Mr. President, let me say, and say with particularity; and say, not only for myself, but I feel I can say it for every member of this body, that no one who has spoken in criticism of any part of this measure is opposed to the general proposition that Chinese laborers, whether skilled or unskilled, should be excluded. I think every member of this body agrees to that proposition. We have a right to agree to that proposition if we approve that policy. That has become an established policy, the wisdom of which no one now, so far as I have heard any expression, questions. It is not only a wise policy that the Chinese laborer should be excluded and efficiently prohibited from coming to this country, but it is a policy which we have a right to adopt and enforce by appropriate legislation under the treaty stipulations we have with China.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss that question. It is not necessary that it should be discussed. I refer to it with particularity only because there are those here who, speaking on this subject in this debate, have taken occasion to say that which looks as if they were trying to put those of us who have seen fit to criticize this measure in the attitude of favoring the coming into this country of Chinese laborers.

While I do not propose to discuss the general proposition that we have a right to exclude laborers under our treaty, and that it is a wise policy that we should so exclude, neither do I intend to discuss any of the provisions of this bill in that behalf to determine whether they are drastic or otherwise. I might differ from the committee as to the necessity of some of those provisions; but that is a matter that is nonessential, if I may, without being misunderstood, use that term. The committee having examined into that matter, the provisions which they have seen fit to report in favor of in that regard I am disposed to accept.

My objection to this bill, therefore, is not on account of its prohibition of Chinese laborers coming into this country, nor of any provisions contained in this bill for giving effect to that policy of prohibition of Chinese laborers. My objection to it is that in its other provisions—the provisions having reference to what has been termed here the exempted classes—it is, first, in violation of our treaty obligations, and, in the second place, irrespective of our treaty obligations it is unwise and calculated to do serious injury to the best interests of this country, and to nobody in this country so much as to the wage-workers of this country.

Some Senators in discussing this bill have apparently taken it upon themselves to assume and to speak as though they were the special representatives of the laboring men of this country. Mr. President, if they are, in my judgment they are most mistakenly undertaking to advance the interests of the laboring man. The interests of the laboring man do not lie in the direction of improper treatment of the great Chinese people, and certainly not in a violation of our treaty obligations.

The provisions of this bill of course are such, and intended to be such, as to keep out Chinese laborers. In my opinion the provisions of this bill as to the so-called exempted classes, those who are not laborers, are designed in practical effect to keep out everybody else who is a Chinaman, but not a laborer. In other words, Mr. President, it is not stating it any too strongly to say that the difference would not be material in practical results if we were to strike out all after the enacting clause and make this bill read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act no Chinaman shall be allowed to come into the United States.

That is what is the effect of it. By that I mean to say that the definitions of the terms "teachers," "students," "merchants," and "travelers" are such, and the requirements with which they must comply in order to get into this country under this law are such, as to practically make it impossible for any of them to come into this country. "Oh," it is said, "we have recognized their right to come; we have provided that they may come." Yes, but with a provision that makes it impossible for any of them to want to come or desire to come or to be likely to come. That is what I shall undertake to point out.

I say at the beginning that it is just as futile to say that we have provided here for Chinese teachers, students, merchants, and travelers to come into the United States, attaching the provisions you have attached, as it would be to say you had provided for them to come in if, instead of the requirements you have here, you were to say that every teacher, student, merchant, and traveler may come into the United States of his own free will and accord whenever he wishes to do so, provided he can show, like the Indian in the Pocahontas picture in the rotunda, that he has six toes on his right foot and only four toes on his left. It would not be a bit more ridiculous.

Now, Mr. President, what is it we have a right to do in legislating on this subject in view of our treaty stipulations? Of course, if we want to violate our treaty obligations we can do so. The Congress of the United States can abrogate a treaty by refusing to comply with its provisions and requirements; but I take it that no Senator wants to violate any provision of our treaty. Certainly Senators have been asserting that they did not want to violate any treaty, for on every occasion, and indeed when there was apparently no occasion for it, they have been particular to emphatically assert that this bill is but a codification or compilation of the laws already in force, and I have heard it repeatedly asserted here that there is not a provision in the bill which is not warranted by our treaties and consistent with our treaty obligations and the rights of Chinamen under them.

Now, let us see what our treaty rights, stipulations, and obligations are. I have taken the trouble, Mr. President, recognizing the importance of this subject—for it is important not only as involving our good name as a great people, but it is important also as involving in a great way the prosperity of this country, especially the prosperity of the men who work in the factories, in the mills, in the foundries, and in the shops of this country—I have taken occasion, in view of that, to look carefully at the entire record. I need not repeat it all. At this stage of the debate Senators are familiar in a general way with our treaty engagements, but I may briefly recapitulate them in order that I may reach by proper approaches what I want to say.

Our first treaty, as all know, was a treaty of peace, amity, and commerce with the Chinese nation, entered into in 1844. That treaty continued until 1858, when the treaty now in force was negotiated, ratified, and put into operation. I do not mean that it is in force just as it was then adopted, but I mean that that is the basis of all the treaty provisions now in force and effect between China and the United States.

The treaty of 1858 was substituted for the treaty of 1844, except possibly as to some minor provisions. The treaty of 1858 is very long and comprehensive and covers generally the subjects that could be treated of in such an instrument. I do not wish to call attention to any of its provisions except only one article. I refer to Article XXV. I do not call attention to the rest of the treaty because nothing is in the treaty except only in Article XXV that is pertinent to this discussion; that is to say, in this treaty the subject of immigration was not dealt with, neither was the subject of classes dealt with in any manner, but this provision is here. I have not heard anybody call attention to it, and I do so because it is in force and effect this very minute and has been in force and effect from the moment when the treaty of 1858 was adopted. But I will show you how it bears presently on the question that we are compelled here to consider.

Article XXV of the treaty of 1858 reads:

It shall be lawful for the officers or citizens of the United States to employ scholars and people of any part of China, without distinction of persons, to teach any of the languages of the Empire, and to assist in literary labors—

See how broad it is—

It shall be lawful for the officers or citizens of the United States to employ scholars and people of any part of China, without distinction of persons, to teach any of the languages of the Empire, and to assist in literary labors.

This was a treaty negotiated at the solicitation of the United States, and that is a provision in behalf of the United States. That is not all. The clause continues:

And the persons so employed shall not for that cause be subject to any injury on the part either of the Government or of individuals; and it shall in like manner be lawful for citizens of the United States to purchase all manner of books in China.

Mr. President, that provision of the treaty of 1858 has never been under consideration by the treaty-making representatives of the two Governments since the moment when it was adopted; it stands to-day as the supreme law of this land. Any citizen of the United States has a right by that treaty, any person in China has a right, if a person in the United States sees fit to exercise his right, to accept employment as a scholar or as a literary man, to assist in any kind of literary labor in the United States and to come to the United States for that purpose. Let us bear that in mind.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Does that clause provide that this employment shall be in the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. It does not in express words say that the person so employed shall come to the United States, but, Mr. President, what avail is it to me here in the United States to have a right to employ a Chinese scholar or literary man to assist me in literary labor or to teach the Chinese language, unless I can bring him to the United States, where I am likely to want such person and to utilize him; and for the Senator to suggest that this means nothing more than that a citizen of the United States going to China, and being there may there employ a man to assist him in literary labor is, it seems to me, entirely unwarranted.

Mr. LODGE. I only asked if it was expressly stated.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I say it is not expressly stated. But I submit that there is no room for argument as to what is intended, and the right is given and broadly given to the Chinese on the one hand to employ Americans and American teachers and American people of literary qualities to assist them, and then, reciprocally, the right is given to the people of the United States to employ that class of Chinese people. That provision is now in force. That was the treaty of 1858, and without further comment I pass from it to the next treaty, which is known as the "Burlingame treaty."

I need not comment on the circumstances attending the negotiation of that treaty. All are familiar with it. It was thought at the time to be one of the most brilliant chapters in American diplomacy. When Mr. Burlingame, resigning his position as minister to China, headed an embassy and brought it to the United States, attracting the attention of the whole country, visiting Washington, visiting Congress, he was everywhere received with acclaim, and as a result of it all he negotiated and secured the ratification in due time of what is known as the "treaty of 1868." Ten years had passed since the other treaty from which I have been reading had been put into operation.

Now, what is the character of this Burlingame treaty? It is not a general treaty, but it is, according to the expressions of the treaty itself, a supplementary treaty. The purpose of it was to adopt "additional" articles to the treaty of 1858. There was not a thing in the treaty of 1858 interfered with. However, as I said a moment ago, the treaty of 1858 did not deal with the subject of immigration. This dealt almost exclusively with that, and this was negotiated and adopted because there was no provision about immigration in the treaty of 1858.

Now, in this treaty, the articles of which are additional to the treaty of 1858, not inconsistent with, those occur Articles V and VI, both of which I wish to read. Senators are already pretty familiar with them, but I desire to have them put in the RECORD in this connection.

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China, or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

ARTICLE VI.

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most-favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

Stopping there for the moment, for there is another section to which I wish to call attention and read, there is by the adoption of Articles V and VI the unlimited right, the unrestricted and unrestrained right, conferred upon the Chinese to come and go in this country just as the citizens of other countries come and go with whose countries we have treaty relations. Now, passing sections 5 and 6, I wish, Senators, to call particular attention to Article VII, for this article is supplementary to the article upon which I have commented, found in the treaty of 1858. It relates to education, scholars, teachers, and their rights, not naming them in the way they are named in subsequent treaties, but as I shall read; and this stands as section 25 of the treaty of 1858 stands, absolutely without change or modification down to this moment:

ARTICLE VII.

Citizens of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under the control of the Government of China; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects shall enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under the control of the Government of the United States which are enjoyed in the respective countries by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. The citizens of the United States may freely establish and maintain schools within the Empire of China at those places where foreigners are by treaty permitted to reside; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects may enjoy the same privileges and immunities in the United States.

That stands unaffected by any subsequent treaty provision.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that it stands so entirely unaffected by the treaty of 1894 that Chinese laborers can come in under that clause?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; not at all. I do not suppose anybody would want to bring here a Chinese laborer of the type we are seeking to exclude for the purpose of establishing an educational institution or assisting in the conduct of it, but what I wish to call attention to is that the Chinamen, by our treaty obligation which is to-day in force, have a right to establish and maintain educational institutions in this country, and therefore, of course, to bring here everybody necessary thereto.

Now I am coming, as I said at the outset I would, by proper approaches, to the very point in all this controversy. The question about which we are concerned is not a question as to the admission of laborers; we are all agreed that they shall be excluded; but the question is whether or not the exempted classes, those who are not laborers, shall be allowed to come, and when we have a provision of this kind, viz, that the Chinese have a reciprocal right to establish and maintain educational institutions in this country, to conduct them, to teach the Chinese language, or anything else they want to teach in those educational institutions, we have no right to render nugatory, null, and void a provision of that kind; and an attempt to do it is a violation of the honor of this country—something you can not afford to do, no matter at whose behest we are asked to do it.

Down to and including the treaty of 1868 we have this status resulting from our treaties, that everybody in China, a subject of the Empire, who may want to come to the United States has the free and unrestricted right to come, and the Chinese have the right to establish and conduct educational institutions here. We exercised our reciprocal right to do that. I do not know how many American institutions there are in China maintained to-day, but there are more than one. The Chinese would have the right to have any number they might see fit to have in this country because of that clause of the treaty. Nobody has ever suggested a modification of it.

So much for the treaty of 1868, which let everybody in. The Chinese proceeded to avail themselves of that privilege, and it was not long until we recognized that a mistake had been made—a mistake in this, and in this alone, that the unrestricted immigration into this country of laborers was prejudicial to our body politic and to our best interests.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. That treaty recognized the evil of Chinese importation under contract. China in that treaty undertook to stop it and failed, and then, as they came in under contract just as before, the United States was bound to act.

Mr. TELLER. Is that the treaty of 1880?

Mr. STEWART. The Burlingame treaty of 1868.

Mr. FORAKER. I have already said essentially that. We got better acquainted after the treaty of 1868, and the influx to which we were subjected of Chinese laborers—

Mr. STEWART. China was unable to carry out her part of the treaty to stop the incoming of Chinese.

Mr. FORAKER. By the treaty of 1868 China did not undertake to stop it. Chinese subjects were given a right to come to the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator must be thinking of the treaty of 1880. By the treaty of 1868 it was dealt with in the way I have indicated.

Now, following that came the treaty of 1880. I was about to say the laborers came so thick and so fast that we became apprehensive that bad results would ensue, and at the solicitation of the United States, as the treaty itself recites, China yielded to another negotiation. As the result of that the right of immigration was modified. There was not a modification of the right to establish and maintain educational institutions in this country. There was no modification of the right of any kind of a professional man to come into this country. There was no modification which touched any class of people coming into this country except only the class of laborers.

Mr. STEWART. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was mistaken in the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator had misunderstood me as to the treaty to which I was referring.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. I am now coming to the treaty to which the Senator alludes, or, rather, I will after I am through with this. Now, in this treaty, in view of our desire to restrict Chinese labor, we finally succeeded in securing this agreement, and the record shows that China granted it reluctantly and only after assurances were given by our commissioners as to fair dealing and that it was for the best interest of all concerned. However, that is outside of the record. We stand on the treaty. Article I of this treaty says:

ARTICLE I.

Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable, and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

Stopping there now for a moment, we all know from the recitals in the preamble to this treaty that it was the purpose of the treaty to deal only with Chinese laborers and no other class, and that the only purpose of dealing with that class was to restrict the right of that class to come to this country.

Mr. SPOONER. My attention was distracted for the moment. I should like to ask from what the Senator is about to read.

Mr. FORAKER. I am reading from the treaty of 1880. I am reading from the Compilation of Treaties of 1899. The preamble, which goes before the article I have just read, recites the purpose of the treaty.

Whereas the Government of the United States, because of the constantly increasing immigration of Chinese laborers to the territory of the United States and the embarrassments consequent upon such immigration, now desires to negotiate a modification of the existing treaties which shall not be in direct contravention of their spirit, etc.

Showing that the purpose of it was to deal with the laboring classes.

Now, I wish Senators to note that until this time there was no restriction upon any class, any laborer, skilled or unskilled, any professional man, any man of character, quality, or degree, who was the subject of the Chinese Empire; all had a free and unrestricted right to come to the United States, subject to no other disadvantages or inconveniences than those we imposed on the citizens of the most favored nation.

Mr. CULLOM. And our people had a right to go there.

Mr. FORAKER. And our people had a right to go there. This article provides that as to laborers the United States may, when in its opinion that may be necessary—regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence [of laborers], but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations.

That is the provision in that article. Now follows the second article, and I ask Senators' attention to this particularly, because it has been contended in this debate that because in the second article of the treaty of 1880 certain exempted classes are named, no others who are Chinese, except only those who belong to the exempted classes, are allowed to come. Senators take that position notwithstanding the fact that in this treaty where occurs this article it is provided that only laborers are to be affected. Now, let me read this article, and then I will give you my idea, whether it is right or wrong, as to what the article means:

ARTICLE II.

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or travelers from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

I say it has been contended in this debate that because in Article II teachers, students, merchants, and travelers are enumerated no other classes of people who are not laborers can come in. In other words, because of the recitation here in this way of these facts and the repetition of them in the treaty of 1894, bankers, brokers, civil engineers, every other class of educated men, the great publicists (and they have some of the greatest in the world), and all of their great literary men are excluded; that unless a man is a teacher, unless he is a student, unless he is a traveler, unless he is a merchant, coming within the definition given in this bill, and in certain Treasury regulations which have been relied upon as law, but which I will undertake to show are in open violation of our treaty obligations, he can not come in, narrowing it so that if China were to treat us reciprocally she would have a right, if we pass this bill, to say that inasmuch as the United States, by its Congress, has enacted that no minister, no physician, no engineer, no broker, no salesman, no clerk, no learned man of any character or description shall come into the United States, neither shall any such man come into China from the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Under this construction of the law and treaties and this bill would it have been possible for Li Hung Chang to have come to the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Except as an official.

Mr. FORAKER. Except as an official. Independently of his official character, Li Hung Chang could not have come. He is not a teacher, he is not a student, he is not a merchant, he is not a traveler within the definition given in this bill.

He could not have come here; and I say if China were to treat us reciprocally—and by what authority do Senators say she would not treat us reciprocally if we enact such legislation as this—she would, by an edict, which could be issued in an hour's time by the Emperor, debar from China every missionary who is there, shut up every educational institution we have there, shut out every civil engineer we have there engaged in carrying on American work, in which American capital has been invested. We are building railroads there. We are spending millions of dollars in China. They could drive every American out, if they would only act reciprocally. That is all they would have to do. Who has the right to say they would not do it? Why should they not mete out to us our measure to them?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], speaking here on Saturday last, said that by the treaty of 1894 the Chinese Government undertook to cooperate with us to exclude Chinese laborers, and he challenged anybody to point out an instance where it had assisted and cooperated. I regret that the Senator from Massachusetts is not in his seat. I thought he was there when I referred to this. I will say, however, as I have said that much about it, that I took occasion this morning to go to the State Department to ascertain whether or not there had been any charge made by this Government against the Chinese Government, or any representative of the Chinese Government, of dereliction in the discharge of their undertakings under the obligations of this treaty, and I was told at the State Department that not a single instance of the kind did they have any knowledge of.

In this connection I call attention to a clause in the letter of the Chinese minister, about which we had some debate here on Saturday. I will refer to it now only for that purpose. In the course of this, I think, most admirable letter—admirable in spirit, admirable in point of ability, admirable in its qualities of politeness, logic, and everything else that you can think of—he says, before concluding, addressing Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State:

You know that in regard to the exclusion of laborers my Government and myself have stood ready to cooperate with your Government in making the treaty prohibition effective.

The entire letter is as follows:

No. 240.] CHINESE LEGATION, Washington, March 22, 1902.

SIR: When the Chinese Government consented in 1880 to a modification of the treaty of 1868, whereby the free immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States was restricted, it was provided in the treaty that where the legislation of Congress authorized by that convention was likely to work hardship on the Chinese subjects the minister in Washington would be permitted to communicate with the Secretary of State, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit might result.

In making use at this time of the privilege granted in the cited treaty provision I desire not to be understood as antagonizing the just provisions of pending legislation or influencing Congressional action, but to bring to your attention, and through you to Congress, some of the hardships which will inevitably result to the subjects of China in case some of the proposed legislation should become a law. Should I remain silent until the bills now before Congress be enacted into a law, it will then be too late to remedy the evil. I trust, therefore, that what I say to you may aid the honorable Congress in making a right conclusion on the subject.

I desire especially to direct attention to the bill S. 2960, which has been reported to the Senate from the Committee on Immigration. In the concluding paragraph of the report which accompanies the bill it is said:

"There can be no doubt that under a wise, humane, and fearless enforcement of this act the importation of Chinese laborers will be prevented and the ingress of Chinese merchants and others of the exempt classes facilitated, and that the present relations between the United States and China will be strengthened thereby."

I feel it my duty to say to you, and through you to the Congress which will soon be called to act upon this bill, that if it becomes a law it will have just the contrary effect from that stated by the committee. It can not fail to seriously disturb the friendly relations which have up to the present existed between the two Governments and peoples.

I do not wish to go into the different provisions of the bill in detail, but I should like to call your attention in a general way to its effects. It restricts the privileged Chinese persons, other than laborers, to come to the United States to only five classes, viz, officials, teachers, students, merchants, and travelers, in direct contravention to the treaty of 1880, in Article I, where it states that the limitation or suspension of immigration shall apply only to laborers, "other classes not being included in the limitation." So also the history of the negotiation shows that it was the intention of the two Governments that laborers alone were to be excluded.

Under the bill there would be excluded bankers, capitalists, commercial agents or brokers, and even merchants who come only to make purchases; also scholars and professors, of which there are many in China of high attainments; also physicians, clergymen, and many other classes which do not fall under the five classes exempt by the bill. The provisions of the bill as to the five exempt classes are so restrictive as to practically nullify the treaty in regard to them. The definitions as to teachers, students, and merchants are so contrary to the spirit of the treaty as to make them almost impossible of observance.

A woman married according to the Chinese custom to a person of the exempt classes would be prohibited from entering the country, because according to the provision of the bill it is necessary that the marriage shall be legal and binding by the laws of the United States.

The bill requires that all Chinese laborers now in the United States shall undergo a new registration. It will be remembered that my Government remonstrated against the first registration that was proposed under the Geary law, and only consented to it at the earnest request of the Secretary of State at the time. All the Chinese laborers submitted to that requirement and were registered, and now it is proposed to nullify all that and subject them to the annoyance and trouble of a new registration. It is an unnecessary hardship and should not be required.

The bill also contemplates the registration of all merchants and of others of the exempt class. This can not be required under the treaty, but the bill attempts to obviate that obstacle by making the failure to register a serious prejudice of their rights.

I have heretofore complained to you of the great hardships to which laborers, merchants, and others are subjected after they have been admitted to the United States and are lawfully domiciled in this country. Past experience shows that Chinese have been arrested by the wholesale, placed in jeopardy, and subjected to molestation and insult. When found innocent, no redress is obtained for such illegal arrest. Persons charged with being unlawfully in the country and taken before a court are denied the privilege of bail, but must remain in jail until their case is decided. The bill, in place of providing some relief for these hardships, rather adds restrictions thereto.

The provisions with regard to transit across the United States imposed by this bill are almost impossible to be complied with, because people who are passing through the United States en route to other countries do not know the laws of the country, and they can not understand the intricate rules and regulations made by the Commissioner-General of Immigration.

The report of the committee says that "the greatest degree of fairness and justice to the exempt classes will be insured by the provisions of the bill, which provides better means for the investigation and disposition of their claims." And again it says: "The features of the bill * * * will tend to protect the worthy immigrant in his treaty rights and privileges."

I have referred to the fact that the provisions as to the admission of the exempt classes are in direct violation of the treaty; and in addition to this the bill provides that the exempt classes must submit their right to admission to the adjudication of the Immigration Bureau, which, as I showed in my note to you of December 10 last, was a purely ex parte investigation, where the claimant was not permitted to confront the witnesses, was deprived of the privilege of counsel, and was excluded from an appeal to the courts. I can not understand how the committee can style this "the greatest degree of fairness and justice," or how the "worthy immigrant is protected in his treaty rights and privileges." It seems to me, on the contrary, that his treaty rights are taken away from him.

The provisions of the bill above referred to, and others which might be cited, place so many restrictions upon Chinese persons and require them to comply with such strict provisions that no Chinese having the least respect for himself would submit to such indignities and come to this country. I fear the effect of the bill, if it becomes a law, will be that Chinese merchants will not come here to buy goods nor students come for educational purposes.

Another feature of the bill must be alluded to. The new possessions of the United States, such as Porto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands, the Philippines, and others which may hereafter be acquired, are subjected to its provisions. It can not be claimed that they were considered when the treaty was negotiated, and it is hardly just or in accordance with international comity that the treaty should be extended to them without the consent of China.

I have received repeated instructions from the Imperial Government, in view of the reenactment of the exclusion laws, to exert myself to see that treaty rights are observed and that no unnecessary hardships are placed upon Chinese subjects, and I feel that on account of the pendency of the legislation referred to I could not refrain from asking you to lay before the honorable Congress the views above set forth. You know that in regard to the exclusion of laborers my Government and myself have stood ready to cooperate with your Government in making the treaty prohibition effective. But with regard to the exempt classes who seek to come here for trading, educational, and other legitimate purpose, I must earnestly protest against the unwarranted and unjust provisions of the bill.

In place of "insuring the greatest degree of fairness and justice," as stated by the Immigration Committee, it would impose such indignities and hardships upon these classes that few, if any, would come here. And notwithstanding the sincere wish of my Government and myself to maintain and cement closer the friendly relations between the two countries, I greatly fear that those friendly relations would be endangered by the enforcement of the act.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

WU TING-FANG.

Hon. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. Hay sent that letter to the Senate of the United States without taking any exception to that statement. He acquiesced in it, and he acquiesced in it because he had no ground to take exception to it—no ground, I say, because of what I learned at the State Department this morning. There is not one single charge registered there against the Chinese Government with respect to its obligations under these treaties to assist in making this prohibition effective—not one.

Now, another thing. When we read in this treaty, in Article I and in the preamble, that it has reference only to the laboring classes, we are quite prepared, it seems to me, if we are going to take the sensible view of how the language should be construed, if we are going to take the instrument by its four corners and read it altogether, to take issue with those who say that the enumeration of the five exempted classes excludes all other classes, who are not laborers. Let me read it again:

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States, shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

Just preceding that it is stated that Chinese laborers shall be excluded, but that no other class shall be included in that exclusion, and yet we are told that because five classes are named, on the principle that naming one excludes all others, all others are to be barred out and were intended to be.

Mr. President, it is just as manifest as anything can be—and I reached that conclusion as soon as I read these treaties and before I had any knowledge of the facts in regard to this matter—that those classes were enumerated by way of illustration, not as an intended enumeration of all the educated classes who might come in, and that the way to read it, in view of the first article, in which it is expressly stated that only laborers are to be excluded, is:

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or as travelers from curiosity, etc.

That would convey the proper meaning; that would show that it was the intention of the parties to bar out laborers and let everybody else come in, and that they enumerated a number of classes only to indicate what classes might come.

Now, I have confirmation of that. My visit to the State Department was not in vain. I found that on December 10 the Chinese minister sent a communication to the Secretary of State, which was sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. It is a very able communication. I do not know why it was not sent to the Senate. I do not know why it does not appear in the reported hearings had before the committee. This document is dated "Chinese Legation, Washington, December 10, 1901." On page 5 of this publication—

Mr. TELLER. What document is it?

Mr. FORAKER. This is entitled "Exclusion of Chinese Laborers." It has not been printed as a Senate document. I think it ought to have been as a part of the hearings before the committee, and I will ask to have it printed as a Senate document.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me, I hold in my hand a Senate document which is a republication of the letter of the Chinese minister to the Secretary of State of the same date.

Mr. FORAKER. Perhaps that is this.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is dated December 10, 1901.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I did not know such a document had been printed. I have never been able to find it, and it was placed in my hands only this morning.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is No. 162, but I do not know whether it is the same document or not.

Mr. FORAKER. What the Senator from Indiana calls my attention to, and I am very much obliged to him for doing it, is the same thing. I was not aware it had been printed as a Senate document. In view of that, I withdraw my request if I had made it, as I intended to do, that it may be printed as a Senate document. On page 5 of the publication, as I have it before me, appears the following from the Chinese minister:

The treaty of 1894 in its preamble recites the object of the treaty of 1880, and gives as the reason for its amendment "the antagonism and much deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise." Thereupon it amends Article I of the treaty of 1880, under which the immigration of Chinese laborers could be suspended, but not absolutely prohibited, by authorizing their absolute prohibition for ten years—

He is speaking now of the treaty of 1894, which I have not yet come to, but will in a moment. In this respect the two treaties are practically the same, so what I am putting in here is applicable to the treaty of 1894 as to that provision:

And it amends Article II, as to Chinese laborers, under which they were allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, by restricting their return to the United States by the terms set forth in Article II of the new treaty. A provision not found in the treaty of 1880 is added, as to registration of "Chinese laborers;" but in no other respects is the treaty of 1880 modified or affected by the treaty of 1894, except as already stated respecting the certificate to be given to Chinese subjects residing in foreign lands. It repeats in Article III the recital of "officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure," but expressly states that their right of coming to the United States is under the status "at present enjoyed;" that is, under the treaty of 1880. In the Chinese text of Article II of the treaty of 1880 and of Article III of 1894, the words "officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure" are followed by the words "et cetera."

Which clearly shows the intention of the negotiators and confirms my argument on this point.

Now, Mr. President, I said before reading this that to any man accustomed to the construction of language, to any man capable of analyzing the provisions of a treaty, it would necessarily be manifest when he would come to read this treaty as a whole and construe this provision in connection with the context, that he would have to read it in order to give good sense to it, with an "et cetera" following, or, as "for illustration," or some language of that kind, thrown in simply to show that the recited classes were only illustrations of the classes that were to be admitted. Necessarily he would have so to treat it because the treaty, so plainly that no man can misunderstand it, expressly declares that only laborers are to be excluded and that no other class shall be affected by that limitation or restriction.

My contention is, therefore, Mr. President, that after the treaty of 1880 had been negotiated and put into operation our status was this: We had a treaty of peace, amity, and commerce with China, under which they had a right to come into this country subject to this restriction, that laborers could not come if we saw fit to suspend the right, but that all other classes had a right to come of their own free will and accord—teachers, merchants, travelers for curiosity, officials, students, publicists, physicians, theologians, Confucians, philosophers, anybody who might see fit to come, who was of a class of citizens in China not included within the broad term of laborer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can the Senator from Ohio give any good reason, if his construction is correct, why only the five exempted classes were inserted? If everybody else except cool laborers were to have the privilege of coming in, why was the provision inserted that merchants, students, teachers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure should be permitted to come?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Oregon was in the Chamber when I was dwelling upon that, I have spoken to very little purpose, for I have been seeking for the last ten minutes to show that identical thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. I confess that I came in only a moment ago.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I thought so. I have been explaining, if the Senate will indulge me while I briefly repeat, that in the Chinese text of the treaty of 1880 these words are followed by the words "et cetera," showing that they were used only for illustration. The same thing occurs in the treaty of 1894, according to the communication which I have read.

Now, Mr. President, if I may have the Senator's attention further—and I hope the Senator will honor me with his attention until I finish answering his question—

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly; I beg pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. In the treaty of 1880 it is expressly provided that it is to deal with the laborers and nobody else. In Article I it is provided that this Government shall have the right to limit, regulate, or suspend, as it may see fit, in its judgment, having reference to certain purposes enumerated, the right of laborers to come into this country. But it expressly provides that that right of restriction shall not apply to any other class.

Mr. MITCHELL. But that is not the language of the treaty. It does not say it shall not apply to any other class.

Mr. FORAKER. I am quoting the exact language of the treaty. The Senator is mistaken. In article first, and that is what I am talking about, there is this language:

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it.

Now, that refers only to laborers.

The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations.

Mr. MITCHELL. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. If physicians, lawyers, and bankers were to have the privilege of coming in, as stated by the Senator, why did they insert the clause to the effect that merchants, teachers, students, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure should be permitted to come? Does not the rule, expressio unius, etc., apply?

Mr. FORAKER. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius" would apply if there were nothing else here but a simple statement that certain enumerated classes should have a right to come, but you must read the whole instrument together, and that rule does not apply and can not apply here, because, in the first place, it says all laborers shall be kept out and no other class shall be kept out. Only laborers are to be excluded. Then it proceeds:

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, etc.

That is for illustration, is my contention, and the Chinese text of this treaty sustains that contention.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose the Senator is aware of the fact that the construction placed upon that treaty by the Treasury Department and also by the courts is different from that which he finds.

Mr. FORAKER. That is next in order, after I call attention to the treaty of 1894.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I here, as shedding some additional light on this argument, call attention to the language of the treaty as proposed by our commissioners? In that treaty as proposed were these words:

And the words "Chinese laborers" are herein used to signify all immigration other than that for teaching, trade, travel, study, and curiosity hereinbefore referred to.

That was objected to by the Chinese commissioners and was abandoned by our commissioners. This is found on page 178 of Foreign Relations.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no doubt whatever but that those words were injected here simply for illustration, not to name those who might come and upon the principle of exclusion referred to exclude everybody else.

Now, the Senator from Oregon asked me, and I call attention to this particularly, if it be true that the construction I am contending for is the correct one, why is it that the Treasury Department and everybody else construed it differently? I am surprised that the Senator should ask that question, because he is mistaken in his assumption. The Treasury Department never did so construe it until within the last five or six years, until the administration of this law fell into the hands that are now administering it. On the contrary, until then, they construed it precisely as I contend it should be construed, and the Supreme Court of the United States itself so construed it.

I call the Senator's attention, in the first place, to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wong Shing v. The United States (140 U. S., p. 424). The syllabus of this case I will read. The decision was on the 11th day of May, 1891. It considers all the legislation enacted down to that time, and all the treaty provisions that we had agreed upon down to that time. Therefore, it passes upon the treaty of 1868 and 1880 and the legislation of 1882, 1884, and 1888. What do the Supreme Court say? They had before them the treaty of 1880, the last which at that time had been entered into. They say, in view of it all, after carefully considering and reviewing it all:

The result of the legislation respecting the Chinese would seem to be this: That no laborers of that race shall hereafter be permitted to enter the United States, or even to return after having departed from the country, though they may have previously resided therein and have left with a view of returning; and that all other persons of that race, except those connected with the diplomatic service, must produce a certificate from the authorities of the Chinese Government, or of such other foreign governments as they may at the time be subjects of, showing that they are not laborers, and have the permission of that government to enter the United States, which certificate is to be viséed by a representative of the Government of the United States.

In other words, Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States in 1891, reviewing this identical treaty upon which I have been commenting and reviewing all our legislation prior to that time enacted, said the effect of it all was to exclude laborers and to allow everybody else to come who was not a laborer on the production of a certificate from his own government viséed by our representative at the place where it was granted.

Now, does not that foreclose this whole matter? And, Mr. President, how was it as to the Treasury Department? We are told in this debate about Treasury regulations. There were no Treasury regulations until quite recently inconsistent with this contention. On the contrary, all our Treasury regulations recognized that we had a right to exclude laborers, and did not have a right to exclude anybody else. Never until 1898 was there a different rule, at which time an opinion was given by the Attorney-General, which has made all this trouble.

But, Mr. President, the whole case is as clear as anything can be. Here is what Hon. John G. Carlisle, while he was Secretary of the Treasury, said on this subject. I have known Mr. Carlisle all my life. I practiced law with him at the same bar practically. He lived across the river from Cincinnati, in Covington, Ky., and practiced there for thirty years or more. He is known, however, to this body. He was a member of it for years. Every man knows that he is one of the foremost lawyers of this country. Here is how he construed this matter. In the directions which he gave on the subject in 1893, he said:

No class of Chinese are prohibited from coming into the United States, or remaining there, except such as may properly and within the meaning of said statutes be known as "laborers."

It was in 1880 that that treaty was adopted. I gave the Senate my opinion as to how it should be construed. The Senator from Oregon rose in his place to know, if I contended for that, why it was that the courts and Treasury officials had construed it in the opposite way, so that not only laborers but every other class of people except the expressly enumerated class were excluded.

My answer to him is that the courts and the Treasury officials never did so construe it until 1898, but they construed it just as I have construed it, just as every man who conscientiously and candidly examines this matter, it seems to me, is bound to construe it, that by the treaty it was intended to preclude laborers and allow everybody else to come in, and that the five exempted classes that were named for purposes of illustration, and it was never dreamed that we were to bar out representatives of mercantile houses, salesmen, brokers, civil engineers, publicists, physicians, theologians, and other men who were desirable in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to put into the RECORD two recent cases where Chinamen were refused admission to this country.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to put in one other ruling; I will then quit that point, and I would rather do that in this connection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I gave you what Mr. Carlisle said in 1893. In 1896 Hon. Charles S. Hamlin, Acting Secretary, to whose Department Chinese matters especially belonged, announced the following, shown in Regulations of 1896, at page 9. He says:

The persons referred to in the acts of Congress to which these regulations applied, and whose immigration into the United States is prohibited, are limited to Chinese laborers.

That was in 1896, and there was never, Mr. President, until after 1896, an attempt on the part of any Treasury official to give to this any other interpretation, and 1896 was two years after the treaty of 1894 was negotiated and put into operation.

Now, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire to put into the RECORD what he desires to put in, while I look up the treaty of 1894.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to two cases in point. One is as follows:

This certificate is issued to Tang Pao Tung, the person hereinafter described, and whose photograph is hereto attached, a Chinese person "other than a laborer," who is about to go from China to the United States, as evidence of the permission of the Chinese Government for him to go to the United States and as a means of establishing his identity.

Intends to go within the United States to study the English language at his own expense.

This above-described man (or woman) is entitled to come within the United States.
Viséed, June 28, 1901.

JOHN GOODNOW,
Consul-General, United States of America, Shanghai.
YUAN,
Taotai of Shanghai.

NOTE.—This certificate must be filled out exactly and signed by the duly authorized Chinese official. It must be viséed by the United States consul after proper proof is given him of the correctness of the statements herein.

Tang Pao-tung, the holder of the above certificate, arrived at Malone, N. Y., in July, 1901, and applied to the collector of customs at that port for admission into the United States as a student. His application was denied on the ground that, as stated in his certificate, his coming to this country to study the English language did not make him a student. Accordingly, he had to return to China. There is not the least doubt that Tang Pao-tung was a student within the meaning of treaty provisions. His father was a comprador, one of that wealthy class of Chinese who act as middlemen between foreign importing houses and Chinese merchants in China, and was amply able to provide him with necessary funds during his stay in this country.

There was no question of fraud in this case. The applicant was denied admission on a mere technicality.

The other, Mr. President, is the case of Yee Ah Lum:

CERTIFICATE FOR MERCHANT.

To all to whom these presents may come:

This is to certify that Yee Ah Lum, a Chinese person "other than a laborer," is about to go to the United States and is hereby permitted and entitled under the provisions of section 6 of the act of Congress of the United States of America, entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, approved May 6, 1882, as amended July 5, 1884," and the treaty between the United States of America and China, dated November 17, 1880, and the treaty between said Governments dated December 8, 1894, to go within the United States of America upon presentation of this certificate to the collector of customs of the port in the district of the United States at which he shall arrive.

The individual, family, and tribal name in full of said permitted person is: Individual, Lum; family, Ah, and tribal, Yee.

The following is the name of the said permitted person in his own proper signature:

His title or official rank is ———.

His age is 20 years.

His height is 5 feet 4 inches.

His physical peculiarities are well-defined scar on left side of forehead.

His former and present occupation is that of merchant, doing business under the name of Chuen Chin, having a capital of $12,000, and this applicant's interest therein is $4,000 in such business which he pursued in Canton for the period of three years.

His place of residence has been in San Ning, Kwang Tung, China.

This certificate is issued in accordance with the provisions of the treaties and laws aforesaid, and it is evidence of permission having been granted to the said Yee Ah Lum to depart from China for the purpose of visiting the United States.

Issued by the Imperial Government of China at the office of the superintendent of the imperial customs at Canton. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of my office on the 30th day of May, 1899.

CHWONG SHAN,

Superintendent of Imperial Customs, Canton, China.

I, Hubbard T. Smith, vice-consul of the United States at Canton, do hereby certify that I have examined into the truth of the statements set forth in the foregoing certificate, and find upon examination that the same are true; that the seal and signature to the foregoing [Photograph] certificate are the genuine seal and signature of the duly qualified and acting superintendent of the imperial customs at Canton. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of this consulate at Canton on the 1st day of June, 1899.

HUBBARD T. SMITH,
United States Vice-Consul in Charge.

Fee, $1 gold.

[Indorsement.]

Certificate 82; serial 576; name, Yee Ah Lum; class, merchant; place, August 15, 1899, No. 685, Chinese; Ex. S. S. Gaelic, July 30, 1899; registration, —; partnership, —; landed, —; denied September 11, 1899; J. P. Jackson, collector.

It is to be observed that no mention is made in the English portion of this certificate of the nature and character of the applicant's business, but in the Chinese portion it is expressly stated that he is a dealer in pearls and jade ornaments.

Yee Ah Lum, the holder of the above certificate, was one of some 30 Chinese merchants of Canton who came to the United States in August, 1899, for the purpose of buying American goods. Their applications for admission into this country were rejected by the collector of customs at San Francisco on the ground that their certificates were defective. The alleged defect was simply the omission of the particulars respecting the nature and character of their business in the English portion of the certificates, though such particulars were plainly stated in the Chinese portion. Thereupon Yee Ah Lum and the other Chinese merchants appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, but the Secretary sustained the decision of the collector.

It was urged on behalf of Yee Ah Lum and other merchants that as there was no doubt that they were bona fide merchants they should be allowed to land on a good substantial bond, and that their certificates be sent back to China to get the American consul to supply the omission, but this reasonable request was not acceded to.

They were accordingly deported. It was afterwards learned that they went to Europe to make their purchases.

The above-mentioned cases are only typical cases of bona fide Chinese merchants and students who have been denied admission into the United States. Special attention is called to the fact that in the two cases above mentioned the proper consular officers of the United States certified to the truth of the statements contained in the certificates, and yet the applicants were not permitted to land on account of some frivolous objection or other. This is certainly contrary to the intent of treaty stipulations.

Mr. President, I simply put these two typical cases in the RECORD to show that the contention of the Senator from Ohio is true, that this is not only the exclusion of laborers but practically the exclusion of all exempted classes.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, Mr. President, the next treaty was that of 1894. By the treaty of 1880 it was provided that the United States might, whenever in its opinion it was necessary for the purposes named, regulate, limit, or suspend. In 1894 another modification was negotiated by the treaty of that year agreed upon, and I call attention to it now before I call attention to the legislation that followed the treaty of 1880.

By Article I of the treaty of 1894 it was provided as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of ten years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratification of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

Article II goes into details as to how that provision shall be enforced with respect to laborers of a certain class. I will not stop to read it, because there is no contention about that.

Article III, however, is important, and it is as follows:

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein.

I call attention to that. In a moment when I come to speak of this bill, I will point out that by the provisions of this proposed legislation a student can not come into the United States until, meeting all the other absurd and impossible conditions imposed, he agrees and stipulates also that immediately after the completion of his study he will depart from the United States. The treaty provision is that he may come, and having come he may reside in the United States, yet we are told that this proposed legislation is not inconsistent with the treaty.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me first to read all this article.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is in this direct connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to read all, and then I will yield with pleasure. I want it all to go into the RECORD together. The balance of Article III is as follows:

To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States, they may produce a certificate from their Government or the Government where they last resided viséed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

In other words, Mr. President, only laborers are prohibited, and all other classes have a right to come and here reside. I call attention in this connection to the fact that they are not required by this treaty to come here to follow here their avocations in China. A merchant in China has a right to come here because he is a merchant. His right to come is not to be restricted to a case where he wants to become a merchant in the United States.

A man who is a student within the accepted meaning of that term has a right to come here, not because there is some particular study he wants to pursue in the United States, but because he is a student. And so it is with every other class named. The publicist is not, if he is within the exempted class, to be allowed to come here because he wants here to practice statesmanship, but because of his character.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. This bill professes and purports to permit that very thing to be done. Now, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio what test he would apply for the purpose of determining whether a man is a teacher or a merchant or a student?

Mr. FORAKER. I am coming to that in a moment. I said in starting out that the fault I have to find with the bill in this respect is that the definitions given are unreasonable. They are of such a character, coupled with the requirements imposed upon them, as to make it impracticable for any of these classes to come.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, what would be reasonable?

Mr. FORAKER. I was coming to that in a minute, but I will take it up now. I say it is reasonable, and it was enough that the contracting parties should say a man is a student. Does not the Senator know what a "student" is? Does not everybody know what is meant by a "traveler"? Does not everybody know what is meant by a "merchant"? This whole thing is simply an effort, Mr. President, never resorted to until after 1896, to refine and legislate away rights guaranteed by a treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator says that I know and everybody knows what is a "student."

Mr. FORAKER. I said the Senator knew.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose a man comes from China and says to the collector of customs at Portland, Oreg., or at San Francisco, Cal., "I am a student." Must the collector take his word for it?

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President; certainly not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then what is the test?

Mr. FORAKER. Only a student can come in under the term "student;" and the treaty provides what credentials he shall furnish. He shall come armed with a certificate granted by his own Government and viséed by the consular representative of the United States at the port whence he sails. That is the only requirement that the treaty imposes, and that is reasonable and all that should be required.

Mr. President, when this treaty was framed, in the first place, nobody dreamed that there would be any difficulty to determine what was meant by the term "laborer," and therefore it was thought enough to say that no laborer should come; that everybody else could come; and then these words crept in for illustration: Teachers, students, merchants, travelers, etc. That is what the Chinese treaty says, and what our treaty, I have no doubt, ought to say. That is what it is in effect.

Therefore, as I have just said, all classes except laborers have a right to come to this country. The only requirement that the Commissioners of the United States, negotiating this treaty, thought it necessary to impose was the requirement that those who would come should come with the certificate of their own government that they belonged to one of these exempted classes, and that that certificate should be viséed by our consular and diplomatic representative.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would ask the Senator from Ohio, in reference to his construction of the treaty of 1894 in this respect, as to whether it is amendatory of any preexisting or then existing treaty, or whether it is a separate and independent treaty, which takes the place of provisions of previous treaties relating to the admission of Chinese or the exclusion of Chinese from coming into the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have already answered the question of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have not heard the Senator do so.

Mr. FORAKER. Then the Senator could not have been in the Chamber all the time I have been speaking—

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir; I have been here.

Mr. FORAKER. And I have certainly been speaking in audible tones.

By the treaty of 1868 all were given the right to come in. By additional articles, as they were called, of 1880, there was a modification of the right, giving us the right to "regulate, limit, or suspend."

But, then, by the treaty of 1880 there is a further modification of the provisions with respect to immigration. All these treaties are in this way ingrafted upon the treaty of 1868, which is still in full force and effect, except only as subsequent provisions are inconsistent with it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should not desire to interrupt the Senator, except that this is a matter of some importance for us to know.

Mr. FORAKER. I will take pleasure in answering any question the Senator may put to me, if I can.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is important for us to know whether the treaty of 1894, so far as it relates to the exclusion of Chinese and the incoming of the excepted classes, is a separate and independent treaty, setting aside all previous treaties on that subject, or whether it is simply amendatory of preexisting treaties.

Mr. FORAKER. Have I not answered that precisely? I started out by answering it.

In the treaty of 1880, which was a modification, by which additional articles were agreed upon, and which treaty is sometimes referred to as the supplemental treaty of 1880, it was provided that we might limit, regulate, or suspend; and we promptly proceeded to suspend. Then in 1894, not satisfied with the treaty of 1880, which gave us that right of suspension, we agreed that as to immigration we should have the right to absolutely prohibit. Of necessity that was a substitute in that particular for the treaty of 1880, and all the other provisions on that subject are similar.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. We can readily gather from the treaty of 1868 that it is amendatory of the treaty of 1858; we can readily gather from the treaty of 1880 that it is amendatory of the treaty of 1868; but I ask the Senator to point out where in the treaty of 1894 there is a suggestion that it is anything but a separate and independent treaty, amendatory of nothing, supplemental to nothing, but a treaty permanently, or at least for a period of ten years, of exclusion of the Chinese; and in that individual case, why are not all the preexisting provisions in the treaties upon that subject set aside permanently? Can the Senator claim that when the treaty of 1894 ceases to exist any preexisting treaty will have effect so far as it relates to the subject of the treaty of 1894?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator seems to proceed upon the theory that if a treaty be supplemental or additional it must say so on its face. That is not necessary. If the treaty in its nature is a further modification of something that has already been treated about, it is supplemental.

It is true the treaty of 1894 does not say anything about what it is supplemental to, but in view of the fact that in 1880 we agreed that we might limit, regulate, or suspend, and then in 1894, treating on the same subject, that we might have a right for ten years thereafter to absolutely prohibit, it is my conclusion, and I have no difficulty in reaching it, that the treaty of 1894 takes the place on this subject of immigration of the treaty of 1880, and it stands there as the law, the supreme law, of the land, that even a Treasury official has no right to violate.

It stands there, Mr. President, until it expires by limitation. When does it expire? At the end of ten years if either party may see fit to denounce it; otherwise it will go on for twenty years; and at the end of twenty years it ceases to be the supreme law of the land, and the treaty of 1880, without doubt, and possibly the treaty of 1868, will then recur.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; but I hope the Senator will not ask that same question again. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. I should be fully justified in asking it again, but I do not propose to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. I submit, Mr. President, that the Senator would not be justified in asking it again, for I have answered that question, not only three times in direct response to a specific question, but I answered it in the beginning of my remarks before the Senator asked it. I know, however, the Senator is in good faith about it, and I am glad to have him ask any question he thinks proper. I only desire to make progress with my remarks.

Mr. PATTERSON. I recall to the Senator from Ohio that on Saturday last he declared interruptions to be the very heart of debate and that he was always ready to yield to them.

Mr. FORAKER. But I added a qualification, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me. I said when the interruptions were intended to expedite the elucidation of a proposition.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is exactly what I am now engaged in doing to the best of my ability.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, have I not elucidated one of them?

Mr. PATTERSON. If I am obtuse, it is my fault.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; the Senator is not obtuse. The trouble with the Senator is that he is very astute.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will state his point of order.

Mr. PETTUS. My point of order is that this conversation on the floor is expressly against the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Ohio state to the Senate whether he distinguishes between the force and effect of a later statute upon a previous statute with which the later statute is in conflict, and the force and effect of a later treaty upon a previous treaty with which the later treaty is in conflict and in which later treaty there is no suggestion that it is either supplementary to or amendatory of a preexisting treaty?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Colorado, there is no distinction between the effect of a subsequent treaty not in harmony with a previous treaty and that of a subsequent statute inconsistent with a previous statute. The latest expression of the legislative will always governs, and in the case of a treaty the latest treaty always governs.

It is true the treaty of 1894 does not say that it is supplemental, but when a previous treaty said we might suspend or limit or regulate this immigration, and after a few years, I will say, of experiment, we said "we have concluded that we want to absolutely prohibit," and we agreed to prohibit, I say the last is a substitute for the former, but the time of its life is prescribed in it, and the life of it is ten years, except only on the condition named, when it will be twenty years.

That being true, let us inquire what difference it makes. Here is the treaty of 1894. It does not make any difference whether it is supplemental or additional, or whether it is absolutely independent. In a certain sense every treaty is independent of every other treaty.

Mr. President, let us see what point there is. I can not see, with all respect to my friend from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], how there is any serious point involved in what he has been trying to impress upon me, for the fact remains, looking alone to the treaty of 1894 as containing all the law, although it does not, for I have already pointed out that there is a part of the treaty of 1858 applicable, a part of the treaty of 1880 applicable, and now a part of this treaty applicable, but, looking to this as all the law—I was about to say all the treaty—applicable to the subject, what difference does it make whether this is absolutely independent of all other treaties or only supplemental?

It is a substitute for the time being for something we had before agreed upon. The question is, What does this provide? It provides as follows—I have already read it—that the United States may under this treaty "absolutely prohibit laborers"—not a suggestion that anybody else is to be prohibited—"may prohibit laborers." Nobody complains of that. We are all agreed that, according to this treaty, Chinese laborers may be prohibited from coming to this country by a statute. Then in article 3 the treaty provides:

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein.

That is the point I want to make particularly emphatic.

To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States, they may—

Do what? The commissioners who represented us dealt with that subject. They determined upon what kind of terms and conditions people who were not laborers might come into the United States, and they wrote it in this treaty, which is the supreme law of the land, unless the Secretary of the Treasury or the Superintendent of the Bureau of Immigration has the power to undo it and override it.

To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States, they may produce a certificate from their Government or the Government where they last resided, viséed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

That being our treaty stipulation, I say that whenever a man who belongs to any class not a laborer comes to one of our ports with a certificate from his government, viséed by our consular representative in China, he has a right to admission without any more ado about it, and no Congress—unless we want to violate and disregard our treaty obligations which, of course, we have the power to do—not even the Congress, unless we want to do that, certainly no Treasury official, has a right, in the name of making regulations, to disregard and override it.

Why, Mr. President, the whole country is familiar with the attitude of the United States with respect to our treaty obligations. It is only a few years ago now—I do not remember just how long—since we had a case that every Senator must well remember. A question arose between this Government and the Government of Great Britain in regard to the extradition of the forger Winslow. We had a treaty—the treaty of 1842—with Great Britain, under which forgery was made an extraditable offense. Winslow committed forgery in this country, fled to Great Britain, and took refuge there. We sent a requisition for him.

The British Government declined to extradite him upon our request unless we would give assurance that we did not mean to prosecute him for any other offense than that charged against him in the requisition, which was forgery. What did this Government say? This Government said: "It is not so written in the treaty, and we will not give you any such assurance; you have no right to ask anything beyond the provisions of the treaty. Forgery is an extraditable offense; this man is charged with it; we have a right under the treaty to take him, and we deny the right of Great Britain to add one iota to this convention."

Then Great Britain turned Mr. Winslow loose, and then President Grant, I believe it was, who was President at that time, sent a message to the Senate of the United States reciting the case and asking the Senate or Congress—the Senate, I believe it was, though I have not been able to look at this matter recently, but I remember it well—to at once suspend all our extradition treaties and proceedings with Great Britain and not to honor any requisition coming to this country from Great Britain until Great Britain agreed to abide by her treaty with us. Great Britain for a time held out, but finally yielded, and rearrested Mr. Winslow, who was then sent here without any conditions being attached.

That, Mr. President, is the way we deal when we come to deal with such powers as Great Britain; that is the way we ought to deal with China, and that is the way she ought to deal with us, and the way China would deal with us if she could.

Senators have been saying upon the floor in the progress of this debate that China has been acquiescing in our action respecting her subjects. China has not acquiesced in any of it from the very moment when we first undertook to legislate, attaching definitions to these terms of "merchant," "student," etc., and undertook to adopt regulations restricting their rights as guaranteed by these treaties; but China, on the contrary, at once commenced to protest, and the history of our foreign relations is full of protests, one after another, under every Administration we have had since this trouble commenced, made by their ministers against such legislation—protests made by direction of their Government, pointing out what the treaty stipulations were as to any teacher, any student, any merchant, any traveler who may come into this country, and denying the right of any official of the United States to add to that requirement. Is not the Chinese Government right about it?

Why, sir, there is not a precedent in the history of our diplomacy to the contrary, not one, nor could there be; and, Mr. President, with no other Government with which we have treaty relations, excepting only China, would we think of such a thing as giving to an official in charge of the Bureau of Immigration power to adopt any kind of regulation, no matter how violative of our treaty obligations, that might occur to him as appropriate, which would make it more and more difficult, until it became impossible, for any Chinaman to get into this country.

Mr. HOAR. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I will remind him of another illustration, the Fortune Bay incident, where the local authorities undertook to enforce sundry regulations against our fishermen.

Mr. FORAKER. Just the same. But the Senator will pardon me for not dwelling longer upon that. I have already occupied so much more time than I intended that I want to hurry to a close. Besides, one illustration is sufficient.

The point I am making, Mr. President, is that according to these treaties—and I am now dealing with the last one, that of 1894—you can not find a word which excludes anybody, except only a laborer, unless upon the principle expressio unius est exclusio alterius; and that principle does not apply, because the text makes it manifest, and surely the context does if the text does not, that the enumerated classes are used only for purposes of illustration. It was never dreamed of or thought of by anybody that when we were providing that teachers and students might come into this country we were excluding all other educated and professional people. They are desirable in this country.

I asked some one the other day during the progress of this debate whether or not a single instance has ever occurred in which any harm has come to the American people or to any class of the American people on account of any of the educated classes of China not being debarred from coming into this country. Nobody has pointed out any such case. We are all agreed that the laborers should be kept out. We have agreed to that by our treaty stipulations, but also that everybody else should come in. I am not going to support any legislation that takes away that right, in the first place, because it is a violation of our treaty obligations; and, in the second place, because it inaugurates an unwise policy.

Now, let me pass to the legislation on this subject. I have undertaken to show what was the nature and the effect of the treaty of 1880, and I have undertaken to show, by quoting from the Supreme Court decisions and from Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Hamlin, what the courts and what the Treasury officials down to 1896 construed these treaties to mean, and that they were construed by these officers and courts to mean just what I have been contending for.

Mr. President, following the treaty of 1880 came first the act of May 6, 1882, and I call the attention of the Senators having this bill in charge to the fact that when they come to section 6—I do not care for the other provisions of the law having reference only to laborers—that when they come to section 6, where they deal with persons other than laborers, they provide simply that for the purposes of identification a person not a laborer shall be allowed to enter when he comes with his certificate viséed properly just as the treaty provided. So the Congress of the United States, in the act of 1882, enacted immediately after the adoption of the treaty of 1880, so interpreted the treaty.

There is much more in that statute which, under other circumstances, I might call attention to in answer to some of the suggestions in this debate, but I hurry through it, coming next to the act of 1884, which was the next legislation on the subject. This was an act amending the act of 1882. The amendments are not very material, except only as making new conditions and provisions more drastic, but there is not enough difference to justify my stopping to speak of them in detail.

What I want to call attention to is that by this act of 1884, for the first time, was a definition of any of its terms attempted. Never by any Treasury official, never by any law officer of the Government, never by Congress, never by anybody had it been pretended that such a word as "merchant," "student," "teacher," or "traveler" needed a statutory definition—never until then. In this act it is provided:

If the person so applying for a certificate shall be a merchant, said certificate shall, in addition to above requirements, state the nature, character, and estimated value of the business carried on by him prior to and at the time of his application as aforesaid: Provided, That nothing in this act nor in said treaty shall be construed as embracing within the meaning of the word "merchant" hucksters, peddlers, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation.

That is the first definition ever attempted, and then the trouble commenced. Immediately upon the enactment of that provision, the Chinese Government commenced to expostulate, to protest, to say our treaty provides thus and so, and by legislative enactment you are adding to the requirements. In the treaty it was stated that every merchant could come freely of his own will and accord into the United States, and that the only credential that he needed to produce to enable him to come was a certificate from the Chinese Government identifying him as a merchant, and that certificate viséed by our consular representative.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BEVERIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. That act, of course, was passed several years prior to the treaty of 1894.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly it was.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, is it not a fact that, by reason of every rule of construction and common sense as well, China, when she entered into a solemn treaty while that statute was on the statute book, assented to that very construction?

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President; I will show you—and that is what I am reading this for—what China accepted and what China did not accept. China entered her protest against this. The archives of this Government are full of communications on this subject, one after another—

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there anything in any treaty regarding it?

Mr. FORAKER. Protesting against these definitions and against these drastic measures intended to make it impossible for those people to come into this country as we had stipulated. That was the first, and that is the only reason I have referred to it.

Following that the act of 1888 was passed; then the act of October 1, 1888, was passed; then the act of May 5, 1892, was passed; then the act of November 3, 1893, was passed; and then came the treaty of 1894, and what did it provide on this subject? The Senator from Oregon asked me to state whether or not this legislation, having been passed prior to the treaty of 1894, China was not bound by the agreement of that convention to accept this statutory definition. No, I answer him; and the treaty on its face so shows.

Mr. MITCHELL. The statement I made was not that China, as a matter of fact, was bound to do it—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. Let me answer the question, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not state that China was bound to do it. China was not bound to do anything except that which she agreed to do voluntarily. What I mean to say is that China entered into a solemn treaty on the 8th of December, 1894, when this statute, which the Senator from Ohio has read, was on the statute books, defining what the word "merchant" meant; and, without any insertion in that treaty to the contrary, she made the treaty. I say she, by doing that, accepted the definition placed there by every rule of construction and common sense.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, by every rule of construction, in view of what is said in this treaty, she did not do any such thing. That is what I want to point out. In the act of 1884 not only was this definition found, but also the requirement under section 6 for registration. China objected to the registration, to this definition, and to all these other conditions and requirements that exceeded the provisions of the treaty. She claimed that they were unwarranted.

Now, that provision for registration was upon the statute books, and what was done with respect to it in this treaty of 1894, which was intended to be a meeting and an agreement between the sovereign powers, by their duly accredited commissioners represented, that would put at rest all these points of difference? That was what was intended to be done, and that is what the record of that convention shows they undertook to do, and what everybody supposed they were doing. What was done? All these acts were under review. The Chinese Government would not agree to any provision of them—and the record shows it—except only the agreement in regard to registration. Now, let me quote what it is:

The Government of the United States, having by an act of the Congress, approved May 5, 1892, as amended by an act approved November 3, 1893, required all Chinese laborers lawfully within the limits of the United States before the passage of the first-named act to be registered as in said acts provided, with a view of affording them better protection, the Chinese Government will not object to the enforcement of such acts; and reciprocally the Government of the United States recognizes the right of the Government of China to enact and enforce similar laws or regulations for the registration, free of charge, of all laborers, skilled or unskilled (not merchants as defined by said acts of Congress), citizens of the United States in China, whether residing within or without the treaty ports.

Mr. President, the record of the convention at which that treaty was negotiated and was agreed upon shows that all these points of objection were under consideration, and that China agreed to waive her objection to registration, for the reason in that treaty mentioned, but did not waive her objection to anything else; and every official of this Government, until after 1896, so construed that treaty. In other words, at that time, working out all that had preceded in the way of treaties and statutes on this subject, they agreed as to what? That Chinese laborers should be absolutely prohibited from coming to this country and all other classes should be allowed to come in whenever they presented a certificate signed by their Government and viséed by our consular representative.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question, while he is on that point, if he will allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the clause in the law of 1884 which the Senator has read was the first attempt at definition?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand him to say that that was in violation of the then existing treaties?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with him. I think it was.

Mr. FORAKER. Absolutely in violation—

Mr. LODGE. In violation of the then existing treaties?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Does he think it is in violation of the treaty of 1894?

Mr. FORAKER. Unquestionably it is, because the provision of the treaty of 1894 is precisely the same in that respect as that of 1880.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely. Then the existing law upon the statute book is in violation of the treaty of 1894?

Mr. FORAKER. It is.

Mr. LODGE. Then we ought to repeal it.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly we ought to repeal it, and that is what I am coming to, and that is what I am contending for.

Mr. LODGE. But the substitute of the Senator from Connecticut extends it in whole.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LODGE. It extends it; it does not repeal it.

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly. I think it is in violation of the treaties, just as this proposed statute is in violation of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to Senators that when they desire to interrupt they must address the Chair, according to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. But here is a choice between two evils. I am coming now to speak of the very matter the Senator has in mind. The continuance of the existing law is far less objectionable than to enact into law a statute that embodies in the way of codification and compilation all these unwarranted and obnoxious rulings of the Treasury Department.

So long as it is only the Treasury Department proceeding under general authority of statute and enacting this, that, and the other provision, prohibitory, for that is all it is, we have no responsibility except only in the sense that we do not act to right a wrong, but when we deliberately take up those regulations and make them the law of the land we indorse and approve and put into operation all that the Treasury, without any warrant or authority, has done.

I have been undertaking to show, and if I have talked to any purpose I have shown, that we have the right under our treaty stipulations with China to prohibit laborers and nobody else. Every other class has the right to come in, and every other class has the right to come in in accordance with the terms and provisions and conditions of the treaty of 1894. That treaty provides that any man who belongs to any one of the classes entitled to come in shall be given admission to this country whenever he produces the certificate of his own Government, viséed by our representative. That being true and the term "laborers," as used in the treaty, having application to nobody else except only laborers, I take exception to certain provisions of this bill, which at last, after so many interruptions, I am happy to realize I have reached.

The first section prohibits laborers. That we will pass by. It is all right. For the present I pass by that section which relates to the Philippines and other insular possessions. I come, therefore, to section 3. Now, this is the first time we have had a definition of the term "laborer," except only heretofore it has been said the term "laborer" should apply to skilled as well as unskilled laborer. Now, we have this provision in the pending bill:

That the term "laborer" used in this act shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled manual laborers, Chinese persons employed in mining, fishing, huckstering, peddling, or laundry work, and those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shellfish or other fish for home consumption or exportation.

I suppose we have a right to make that kind of a definition. I am not going to quarrel with it here, although I think I might with propriety say a good deal in criticism of it as not being warranted by the convention. I pass it by for what is more important.

Mr. PENROSE. That is almost a verbatim copy of the act of 1893. It is the existing law. There is nothing new in it.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. I have already called attention to the fact that the act of 1893 was in violation of the treaty then in existence and one of the precipitating causes of the treaty of 1894, and in the treaty of 1894 we did not adopt any of the objectionable features—I mean objectionable to China—except only the provision of our law in regard to registration. I say by the treaty of 1894 we effaced all that. Is this a part of any law? Let me read:

And every Chinese person shall be deemed a laborer, within the meaning of this act, who is not an official, a teacher, a student, a merchant, or a traveler for curiosity or pleasure, as hereinafter defined.

Now, look at that. That is buttoning it up double-breasted. What is the first part of the definition if the last is to be incorporated into this statute and made a law? If every person is a laborer who is not a merchant, teacher, student, or traveler for curiosity or pleasure, that would seem to be sufficient, and we need not bother about huckstering and catching fish, live or dead, drying them, or otherwise.

Now, what is the purpose of all that? We have a convention under which we can prohibit laborers, and under which everybody else is entitled to come into this country. By this bill they are seeking to have the Congress of the United States say that not only laborers shall be kept out, but that everybody else shall be kept out who does not belong to some one of the five enumerated classes. Publicists shall be kept out, physicians shall be kept out, theologians shall be kept out, philosophers, statesmen, everybody, capitalists, bankers, brokers, civil engineers—every such man shall be debarred the right to come into this country, although by treaty stipulation he has that right.

That is not all. I said it is proposed to make it double-breasted, first defining what is a laborer, and then that all these other people shall be kept out, which is repeating the same definition. Now, next they have devoted a whole section to the subject—

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's very interesting remarks, and I shall not hereafter—

Mr. FORAKER. I shall be very much obliged to the Senator if he will interrupt me at his pleasure.

Mr. PENROSE. In order to set this matter right, once for all, I will state that the provisions of the bill with respect to the exempt classes depart hardly one word from the existing law and practice, and the matter in the bill which the Senator is criticizing as being an improper definition of the word "laborer" is in compliance with the decision of the district court in Ah Fawn, 57 Federal Reporter, page 591, to be found on page 153 of the testimony.

Mr. FORAKER. The 57 Federal Reporter is not very modern.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know—

Mr. FORAKER. And in view of the authorities I have cited it is not good law, for subsequent and long subsequent to any decision that can be found in 57 Federal Reporter, the Supreme Court of the United States told us who had a right to come and who did not have a right to come.

Mr. PENROSE. In that case it was laid down distinctly as a principle that all who were not in the exempted classes were laborers.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; but have I not called the attention of the Senate to decisions of the Supreme Court subsequent to that decision which holds that only laborers are excluded and that everybody else has a right to come. What is the use of citing 57 Federal Reporter? It is like somebody said the other day in telling a story of a man who was gathering up last year's calendars. He was asked, "What are you going to do with them?" He said he was getting ready to sell them in Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Following after those definitions comes this section, to which I wish to call attention:

SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act the privilege of Chinese persons other than laborers to enter or remain in the United States shall be restricted to officials, teachers, students, merchants, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, as hereinafter defined.

Here, then, we have three definitions, each of which I have read separately, following one after the other, defining the word "laborer" in such a way as to make it apply to every class of people in China except only the teachers and students and merchants and travelers and the officials. Now, I have already contended, and I do not want to spend more time upon it, that the five classes are not the only classes, but that all who are not laborers are entitled to come in.

Now, evidently down to that point I am warranted in the statement I made a while ago that it was the purpose of this bill not only to keep out laborers, but everybody else. Stopping at this point, they would unquestionably keep out every laborer and every man of any other class who is not a student, teacher, merchant, or traveler, or an official, and that, I contend, I have shown is unwarranted. Let us look at the definition of these classes.

SEC. 6. The term "teacher"—

Did anybody ever think it necessary to define by statutory enactment what our commissioners meant when they said teachers should be allowed to come in? Why was that language employed? I have shown—simply illustrative—

SEC. 6. That the term "teacher," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who, for not less than two years next preceding his application for entry into the United States, has been continuously engaged in giving instruction in the higher branches of education—

Teaching Greek, and Latin, and astronomy, I suppose, and calculus—and who proves to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer—

Who, of course, would know all about it; those who preside at the ports of entry and lock up the Chinese in a loft for weeks and months at a time until it suits their pleasure to release them, as the testimony shows—and who proves to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer that he is qualified to teach such higher branches and has completed arrangements to teach in a recognized institution of learning in the United States and intends to pursue no other occupation than teaching while in the United States.

Now, let us analyze that. In the first place the treaty says that any man who is a teacher shall have free entry into this country whenever he comes with a certificate from his own Government, viséed by our consul or diplomatic representative in China. That is the only condition. China had a right to answer us, and did answer us, when we undertook to legislate these Treasury regulations upon that provision, just as we answered Great Britain when she asked us to give assurance, before she would surrender a fugitive to be extradited, that we would not try him for any other charge than that named in the requisition—China had a right to answer that it was not so written in the treaty.

She had a right to say, "Our teachers are entitled to free entrance"—and they are. Mr. President, they are entitled, under the treaty of 1858, to come into this country for the purpose of establishing and maintaining institutions of learning. They are entitled to come here under the provisions of the treaty of 1868, to which I called attention, whereby Americans are authorized to employ scholars, or "any people," to use the language of the treaty, "from any part of China, to assist in literary labors."

They are entitled to come in under that provision, and now they are entitled to come into this country under the treaty of 1894 whenever they present the proper certificates properly viséed. But when they present it our representative at San Francisco says: "Have you been teaching for two years next preceding your coming?" Suppose he had not been. Suppose he had been teaching all his life, had no other business, but for two years or even five years had been retired from the active prosecution of his profession and had taken a notion, using what money he had accumulated as a teacher, to travel abroad and see something of the world and come to the United States.

He does not have to come to become here a teacher. If he be a teacher he has the right to come. We did not say a teacher might come if he wanted to teach school here. We did not say a teacher might come if he could teach Latin and Greek and had perfected arrangements to teach in some one of our institutions. We said, "if you are a teacher you can come in." It was our tribute to education. It did not occur to anybody that the coming of a Chinese teacher into this country would hurt labor, or hurt our institutions, or hurt our body politic, or hurt anything else.

Therefore we were content to say any teacher may come in. But, no, he must prove that he has been continuously engaged for two years not only in teaching, but listen to this:

And who proves to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer that he is qualified to teach such higher branches and has completed arrangements—

That he has done it in advance—to teach in a recognized institution of learning in the United States and intends to pursue no other occupation than teaching while in the United States.

I say it is impracticable for such a provision as that to work in the way the treaty intended, and when this came up in a colloquy here a few days ago, we were told by some Senator in the course of the colloquy that no teachers have applied and none are going to apply. Of course they are not going to apply if that is the provision, for what teacher in China can perfect arrangements to teach the higher branches in one of the great institutions of this country until he has had a chance to come here and consult with the faculty and the employing power?

The treaty does not impose any such restriction. The treaty is broad and unrestricted in its relation to that matter. Any man who is a teacher can come, and he does not have to teach at all while he is here, and he can stay here as long as he wants to.

The treaty of 1894 says these classes shall have the privilege of coming at their free will and accord and of residing here in the United States, and we are proposing to take that right away from them. At least, in regard to students. Let me read that definition:

SEC. 7. That the term "student," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who intends to pursue some of the higher branches of study—

He can not pursue any but the higher branches of study—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He can not come to learn the English language.

Mr. FORAKER. No—

or to be fitted for some particular profession or occupation for which facilities for study are not afforded in the foreign country or the territory of the United States whence he comes, and for whose support while studying sufficient provision has been made, and who intends to depart from the territory of the United States immediately on the completion of his studies.

Let me read in this connection the provision of the treaty of 1894:

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein.

That is what the treaty says, and yet we are told that this bill is framed in exact consistency with the treaty stipulations.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to inquire if the Senator's attention has been called to the new departure in Chinese policy just now announced?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes. I have a memorandum of it, and I am going to speak of it in a moment. I am obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin for calling my attention to it, and if I undertake to sit down without doing so, I will be gratified if he will remind me.

Mr. QUARLES. I will suggest to my distinguished friend whether every one of the Chinese youths educated in our high schools and colleges will not be an advance agent for American trade and civilization?

Mr. FORAKER. I am coming to that as soon as I can get to it. Perhaps I might just as well speak of it here.

In the Outlook, the one just issued, I find an article which I desire to read. This is the Outlook of April 12, the one that came last Saturday. I will read it in this connection. No teacher, no student, can come unless he is going to study the higher branches and unless he is going to depart the minute he gets through. I am obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin for calling my attention to this. I cut it out and brought it here intending to use it in another connection, but I will put it in here now for fear I forget it.

EDUCATION IN CHINA.

No more significant sign of progress has appeared within the past six months than the edicts issued in Peking providing for the establishing of schools throughout the Chinese Empire, and ordering viceroys and governors of provinces to select and send students abroad. The first edict declares (1) that the Imperial University at Peking "must be put in thorough order;" (2) that all viceroys and governors shall convert the schools at their provincial capitals into a college, one for each capital; (3) that "each prefecture (including five to ten counties), subprefecture, and independent department shall establish an intermediate school," and that (4) "each department and district a lower grade school, with (5) numerous primary schools."

The curricula of these schools include the usual Chinese classics, to which are added history, the science of Chinese and foreign governments, and industrial science. Thus, in the words of the edict, "a foundation will be laid to secure men equipped for the duties of government." These edicts also mean that there will be a call for a large number of foreign educators who can speak Chinese to open the colleges, intermediate, lower grade, and primary schools, and also to train native teachers in the new learning in every province of the Empire.

Through its organization of 8 viceroys, 16 governors, and 2,000 civil officials the Chinese Government rules its 400,000,000 people. Each mandarin, therefore, controls on an average of 200,000 souls. The central Government seems finally to have grasped the fact that the chief need for China at present is education, of which the first field to be considered is elementary education for the masses. The pedantry which has hitherto characterized Chinese home learning is likely to give place to progressive scholarship, and a new era may begin in China.

Then comes another article, immediately following, entitled "Chinese students abroad," and to this I invite the careful attention of every Senator who is asked to vote for this definition which I have just read, found in the pending bill:

CHINESE STUDENTS ABROAD.

Equally necessary is education of the Chinese students abroad. The world must inform China. All civilized peoples have recognized this. It is a satisfaction that the Chinese Government now recognizes it. Its edict calls upon the viceroys and governors to select young men "of mental gifts, upright character, literary talents, and general knowledge of affairs, who shall go abroad thoroughly to educate themselves, particularly in the specialized branches of industrial science."

Let them acquire a thorough mastery of some profession. * * * When their education shall have been completed * * * and they shall have returned to China, let the viceroys and governors and literary chancellors of the provinces concerned at once divide them into classes, according to the courses of study which they may have pursued, and examine them. If their knowledge shall really correspond with the statements made in their diplomas, the authorities mentioned shall issue a document certifying the same and send it with the student to the board of foreign affairs, which, after further examination, shall select the most worthy and memorialize us, requesting honors to be conferred on them.

As to the expenses attendant upon such travel and study, let each province arrange some satisfactory method of paying the same and it will be permitted to enter the item under the head of "Government expenditure." If those Chinese who go abroad to study at their own expense and report to the Chinese minister in the country visited obtain "first-class diplomas," they may be permitted on their return to China to enter the examinations on the same terms as the students who have been sent abroad by the Government. Thus a quarter of the human race is taking a new departure.

After the ominous darkness which has hung for centuries over the Chinese Empire, this is a ray of light. As we learn from "China's Only Hope," by Chang Chi Tung (perhaps the most enlightened of Chinese viceroys), there is pathetic necessity for the second edict. The majority of the mandarins in power are still unaware of the very nature of the problems which must be solved in China, not to mention their ignorance of the methods necessary to their solution. The only hope of progress is in laying all civilizations under tribute educationally, and this the Imperial Government has now wisely done.

So it is that it is matter for us seriously to take into consideration that we are asked to enact this legislation by which we bar out all students, for it has no other effect, and could not have any other effect, in a practical way, and never was intended to have any other effect, and just at the time when we are asked to enact such legislation China is making provision to send students abroad.

Where? To the United States? No; not here, where we are seeking to exclude them and subject them to all kinds of humiliating and annoying conditions of entrance, but they will send them to Germany, to Russia, to France, to England, and to the other countries of the world, and there they will learn their ways, they will become affiliated with them, and when they go back to China it will be to report the excellence of those institutions, to introduce their merchandise, and to give to those people advantages in trade and commerce.

I do not think a more unwise, impolitic, and, considering our treaty obligations, a more violative provision has been submitted to the Senate of the United States since I have been a member of it than is this bill. I will not vote for any such measure, and if the Secretary of the Treasury undertakes to make any such regulation he does it without any warrant or authority of law, and he ought to be removed from his office for it.

That it is in violation of the treaty no man can question. Every Senator here so admits. Why, then, do we seek to enact it? Are we to suffer any injury from having Chinese students come here? From having teachers come here? From having merchants come here? What becomes of the provision in the treaty of 1858, and still in force, that the Chinese may establish and maintain educational institutions in this country, if no teacher can come except only to teach the higher branches in some institution of learning already established and recognized as such in this country?

Now, I have said as to teachers and as to students probably all that it is necessary I should say. I only want to indicate why, in my opinion, the provisions with respect to them both, the definitions and the requirements they are subjected to, as to certificates and proof of their condition, are all violative of the treaty. The treaty itself prescribes the terms on which they shall come and what credentials shall be sufficient.

Now, we come to the term "merchant." I do not want to dwell upon that. The bill says:

SEC. 8. That the term "merchant," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who is engaged in buying and selling merchandise, at a fixed place of business, and who, during the time he claims to be a merchant, does not engage in the performance of any manual labor, except such as is necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant.

And where an application is made by a Chinese person for entry into the United States as one formerly or at the time engaged in China as a merchant, or in some other foreign country as a merchant, or where such application calls for entry into one portion of the United States from another portion thereof, then, as a prerequisite to entry, the applicant must have been engaged as a merchant for at least one year next preceding his application; and it must appear to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer at the port of entry that he comes to exercise in good faith his calling as a merchant, and that calling exclusively, and that he has the means under his immediate control for forthwith becoming, and has completed the arrangements for forthwith becoming, the owner, in whole or in part, of a good-faith mercantile business in the United States, or any portion of the territory thereof.

That is as far as I have patience to read.

The treaty provides that any man who is a merchant coming to our shores with a certificate to that effect from his Government properly viséed shall have a right to come in, and yet we proceed by legislation, adopting Treasury regulations that nobody ever had any authority to adopt, to so legislate that in addition to that he must show that he has money enough to conduct a business, that he has had certain experience in business, that he has already completed arrangements for engaging in business, and what the nature of it is, and all that. Do you think if we were to go to China under such a treaty provision to let Chinamen come here and they were to undertake to exact such conditions of our citizens we would stand it for a minute? Not one. Everybody knows we would not.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to pursue that subject. Perhaps I had better call attention before leaving it to the definition given of a traveler. I supposed I knew what a traveler was. The commissioners who framed this treaty undoubtedly thought they knew what was meant by a traveler. They did not think it necessary to define that term. They said that students, teachers, travelers, and merchants should have a right to come in. They contented themselves with that. They thought everybody would understand what was meant by that. But this bill, following some Treasury regulations and some legislation that had no warrant whatever under our treaty, proceeds to define a traveler as follows:

SEC. 9. That the term "traveler," used in this act, shall be construed to mean only one who shall establish to the satisfaction of the appropriate Treasury officer that he is in present possession of adequate funds for paying the cost of the intended travel within the territory of the United States and that his purpose in seeking entry is in good faith solely to travel for pleasure or curiosity, and who intends to depart from the territory into which he is permitted to pass promptly on the conclusion of such travel.

I do not want to dwell upon that, but will in a word repeat what I have said about it. Our commissioners said these classes, who were not laborers, should be allowed to come, enumerating certain classes for illustration. If a man be not a laborer he has a right to come, and the treaty prescribes on what condition; and we have no power or authority, without violating our treaty, to add one iota to the provision and condition named in the treaty. This Government would not allow England to do it, and we ought not to ask China to let us do it. The treaty says whenever a traveler or a teacher or a merchant or an official or a student shall come into this country with the certificate of his Government viséed by our representative he shall be allowed to come.

Now, I say I am opposed to all these provisions in the bill that add to that requirement as being violative of our pledged obligation to China, and I do not want to vote for any measure that sanctions any addition to those treaty stipulations. I do not want to do it, because it is not necessary, if we want these exempted classes to come, if we are willing that they shall come, that we should annoy them in undertaking to bar out the laborer. I do not care how emphatically you exclude the laborer; I do not care how drastic, so they be not unreasonable, the provisions of your bill may be to enforce the exclusion of the classes to be excluded, but I do protest against imposing conditions upon classes that have a right to come under pretense that it is necessary to annoy them and debar them to keep out the laborer.

I think in continuing all the laws in force on the subject we of necessity, as I said a moment ago, must continue some objectionable provision of the statute; but I never would vote for it if I had the opportunity to deal with it anew. However, to do that is infinitely preferable to adopting this measure, which codifies and compiles and makes Congress responsible for every one of these Treasury regulations, all of which are without any warrant under our treaty.

Now, Mr. President, there is another view to be taken of this matter. I have already said we are agreed the laborer is not desirable, but by our treaties we have said that other classes are at least permissible. We have agreed that they shall be so treated, that we shall allow them to come. I do not hesitate to say they are desirable. I do not know why anybody should object to a Chinese teacher, a Chinese student, a Chinese merchant, a Chinese traveler coming into this country. Why should we object?

It is said that under guise of being of that character and one of that class they practice the fraud of bringing in the laborer. If so, it is not necessary to annoy the student and the teacher and the traveler in trying to keep out the laborer. Let us legislate drastically, if you see fit, to keep out the laborer, but let us keep our treaty stipulation, and honorably and consistently with the proud character and good name of this Government, let others come as to whom we have agreed they may come. Let us keep our pledged faith.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has called my attention to the fact that I said we have no power to do what is proposed, suggesting that what I must have meant was that we have no moral power. That is true. I thank him for making the suggestion to me, but I think I would have been so understood anyway, for earlier in my remarks I took occasion to say that notwithstanding this treaty, entered into by the President and the Senate, Congress has power to legislate in violation of it. But we do not want to legislate in violation of it, unless we are prepared to abrogate it, unless we are prepared to say so. I say that we are violating it and to that extent abrogating it in legislating in the way proposed, if we should so legislate as this bill proposes.

But, Mr. President, there is another view, and I wish to present it with a word, not undertaking to do justice to it by any means. That is the commercial side of this question which has been referred to. We have been told in the progress of this debate that the laboring interests of this country demand this kind of legislation. Mr. President, I have no doubt but that there are wage workers in this country who have that opinion, who conscientiously are of that belief, who imagine that every Chinaman who comes into this country, no matter whether he is a laborer or not, enters in some manner or other into prejudicial competition with him. But, sir, I deny that the interest of the wage worker can be subserved by legislating in violation of our treaty with China and in such a way as to cut off from this country the influx of the educated classes who are entitled to come.

We have reached in the progress of our development a point where we not only supply our home markets with what we manufacture and what we produce on our farms and out of our mines, but we have a great surplus to sell, which we must sell in the markets of the world. We have been looking across the Atlantic to Europe for markets, and we will continue to look there. But in Europe they will take from us only what little, in addition to what they can produce for themselves, they may want, and that is not enough to exhaust our surplus.

We must look elsewhere, to the whole world—and particularly to the Far East, now that we have a base of operations in the Philippines—to China, Japan, Oceania, the Straits Settlements, and Southern India. They have there a thousand millions of people who are just beginning to learn that they want and must have—if they would keep pace, even in their own way, with the progress of the world—that which we produce, both to wear and to use and to eat.

In China, therefore, the greatest of all the countries to which I have referred, is the greatest opportunity for the development of a market that the world affords to-day. It has been said there are 400,000,000 Chinamen. You might just as well say there are 600,000,000. Nobody knows. It is all guesswork. There has been no census, but nobody says there are less than 400,000,000 to 450,000,000 Chinamen. What is the trade of China? It is only a few years since she began to trade with the world. Already her foreign trade amounts to more than $100,000,000, but out of it all, whatever it may be—and I do not want to go into figures and quote them—we sell there less than 10 per cent, I believe, of what she buys. Why should we sell to China only 10 per cent?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. That is based upon direct imports to China. The exports to Hongkong, which of course all go into distribution in China, are classified under a different head, because it is British. The two together make about $28,000,000.

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be $28,000,000. What percentage is that of the whole?

Mr. LODGE. It is large and will be greater.

Mr. FORAKER. What percentage is that of the whole?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know.

Mr. FORAKER. I have seen it stated that our total contribution is something like 10 per cent. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] tells me that our total contribution amounts to only about one-tenth as much as Great Britain sells them. Whatever the facts may be, we all know that while our trade with China is growing, yet it is but in its infancy. We all know that we have just reached the point where we have a great surplus for which we are to find markets. There is no place in the world so inviting as China. We are to develop our trade there if we are wise.

In that behalf, Mr. President, with a diplomacy that is entitled to the highest eulogy, the Administration of William McKinley secured the assurance of an open door. What does that mean? It means that the United States is to be permitted to go into China on the same terms and conditions that every other nation goes there; that Russia, France, England, Germany are to have no advantage over us to be derived by rebates or exclusion or in any other manner.

We are to have an open, free field, and that is all the American merchants ask. If we have a fair chance our merchants have the ability to do the balance. We have been looking forward with a just and laudable pride to the fact that our commerce with China, just now practically beginning to be important, is to grow with the years until it will not be $28,000,000, as the Senator from Massachusetts says it is, but $100,000,000, $200,000,000, $500,000,000 is not at all an exaggerated expectation.

When was there a time in the history of this Republic when we so needed that market? The wage worker says, "Keep the Chinaman out; do not let him come here and stand by my side to compete with his cheap labor;" and we say, "Very well, we will keep him out." But while we are keeping the laborer out, while we have induced the Government of China to agree with us that he shall be kept out, we are not going to offend and insult the people of China and thus close in our face the door that President McKinley and Secretary Hay, with their wise diplomacy, opened wide for the American merchant and manufacturer and wage worker.

What does the wage worker want? He wants a market for this country in which we can sell the products that he manufactures.

I have no concern about how the wage workers of Ohio may regard this measure. They have good sense. I think the wage worker everywhere has good sense. A man can not work at a lathe unless he has brains. A man can not be a mechanic without having more ability than some people have who undertake to legislate.

I repeat that I have no concern, Mr. President, about the wage-workers of Ohio. They know that what they most desire is that the factories in which they work, the mills in which they are employed, may continue to run; that their employers may continue to have demand for the product which they are turning out. They know that if for any reason the market is taken away the mill must stop, and it does not avail them in such case that the Chinese laborer has been kept out, if through supreme folly in legislation we have closed the door and robbed ourselves of a market and at the same time robbed ourselves of the respect of the world, because we have violated our treaty obligation.

Therefore it is, for I do not want to pursue this matter, that standing here, representing in part the State to which I have referred, I insist that the legislation as proposed by the provisions of this bill is legislation that we can not afford to enact.

What shall be done with it I have not stopped to study. I have supposed that those in charge of the bill and those who are making specific objections to it would probably be able to agree upon amendments that would remove from the measure its objectionable features.

I was much pleased with what the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said in that regard when he addressed us on Saturday. He said there were provisions in the bill which, although a member of the committee, he was dissatisfied with, and he spoke particularly of the seamen clause. I am not going to stop to dwell upon that. Enough has been said against it. I have been trying simply, in a general way, to show, in the particulars I have mentioned, that the measure should not be enacted.

Mr. President, if the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is adopted, I hope it will be with an amendment to the effect that only such regulations may be adopted and enforced by the Secretary of the Treasury as are not inconsistent with the treaties in force. Without that provision in it we will stand in the attitude, as it has been correctly suggested by Senators in favor of this bill, of continuing legislation to which we are taking exception. But that I would rather do, should this amendment be not added, than to adopt this bill, because here we take not simply that which has been legislated by the Congress, but also all the Treasury regulations, and that I can not agree to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Ohio, in the course of his very able argument, because it has been able and interesting, referred to article third of the treaty of 1894, which provides what shall be done by one of the exempted classes in order to enable him to enter this country. It provides, after referring to the different classes of exempted persons; as follows:

To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States they may produce a certificate from their Government or the Government where they last resided viséed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

Now, did the Senator from Ohio consider that provision in connection with section 6 of the act of 1884, which provides as follows:

That in order to the faithful execution of the provisions of this act, every Chinese person other than a laborer, who may be entitled by said treaty or this act to come within the United States, and who shall be about to come to the United States, shall obtain the permission of and be identified as so entitled by the Chinese Government, or of such other foreign government of which at the time such Chinese person shall be a subject, in each case, to be evidenced by a certificate issued by such government, which certificate shall be in the English language, and shall show such permission, with the name of the permitted person in his or her proper signature, and which certificate shall state the individual, family, and tribal name in full, title, or official rank, if any, the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation or profession, when and where and how long pursued, and place of residence of the person to whom the certificate is issued, and that such person is entitled by this act to come within the United States.

If the person so applying for a certificate shall be a merchant, said certificate shall, in addition to the above requirements, state the nature, character, and estimated value of the business carried on by him prior to and at the time of his application as aforesaid—

And so on.

What I wish to get at is this: Does the Senator from Ohio hold that this provision in the third article of the treaty of 1894 abrogates and repeals this section of the treaty?

Mr. FORAKER. Unquestionably, Mr. President; and that is what I asserted over and over again and argued for.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio. I think so.

Mr. FORAKER. Then let me answer your question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, Mr. President, I insist that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will simply leave us without any legislation at all on the subject of the exempted classes, save and except the naked treaty of 1894.

Mr. FORAKER. And what I stand here to assert, and have spent more than two hours in contending for, is that we have no right to add to the treaty provisions in prescribing the conditions on which Chinamen shall be allowed to enter.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is absolutely logical from his standpoint, but where does it leave us?

Mr. FORAKER. I shall show the Senator where it leaves us, if he will allow me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I called particular attention to that legislation; that it preceded the treaty of 1894; that as soon as that legislation was enacted the Chinese Government protested against it; that when our commissioners met with the commissioners of China to consider and negotiate and agree upon this treaty, all these questions came under consideration, and that the commissioners agreed that as to this legislation one point of objection should be waived, and China refused, as the record shows, to waive any other.

What was it China did? The Senator has read from a statute in which the requirement as to registration is found and in which all these other requirements are found.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was retained by the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, here is what the treaty said and what the Chinamen did. They said, "We will not overlook that requirement; you shall not add to the conditions with respect to entry into the United States, but we will overlook your statute in regard to registration;" and so they provided and agreed as follows:

The Government of the United States, having by an act of the Congress, approved May 5, 1892, as amended by an act approved November 3, 1893, required all Chinese laborers lawfully within the limits of the United States before the passage of the first-named act to be registered as in said acts provided, with a view of affording them better protection, the Chinese Government will not object to the enforcement of such acts, and reciprocally the Government of the United States recognizes the right of the Government of China to enact and enforce similar laws or regulations, etc.

At the time when they agreed not to object to the enforcement of the law as to registration their protest was on file as to all these other conditions added to the treaty stipulation, and they were not only then protesting, but they have been protesting against them ever since as being provisions outside of and in violation of the treaty, and the Senator agrees with me that they are in violation of the treaty, and yet he stands here insisting that we shall adopt the Treasury regulations calculated to enforce this invalid provision—I mean invalid in the sense that it is in conflict with the treaty—

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator misapprehends me, and misapprehends, I think, the point I wish to accentuate.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I am not misapprehensive of anything. I will be glad to have the Senator suggest anything. I know he is very much interested in this measure. I am glad to have the benefit of his suggestion. If I can answer where I differ with him, I shall be glad to do it, and if I can not answer, I shall be glad to say so.

Mr. MITCHELL. The point I wish to impress upon the Senator at this time is simply this: I will adopt the Senator's argument so far as he asserts that the third article of the treaty of 1894 repeals the sixth section of the act of 1884. I accept that as logical and correct. I believe the treaty does repeal the sixth section of that act—

Mr. FORAKER. It does not as to registration.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not as to registration, of course. That being so, if we should adopt the Platt amendment, I say all it does in reference to the exempted classes is to leave them precisely where they stand in the treaty, and nothing more.

Mr. FORAKER. That is exactly what I have been standing here contending it would do.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. Why should we not leave it where the treaty leaves it? Why should we by legislation undertake to add to the treaty something that the treaty did not provide? The treaty dealt with this subject.

Mr. SPOONER. We must either leave the treaty as it is or abrogate it.

Mr. FORAKER. As the Senator from Wisconsin well suggests, we must either leave the treaty as it is or else abrogate it. Of course you have the power, so far as the naked power is concerned, to legislate inconsistently with the treaty, but that would be an abrogation of the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. All we propose to do is to legislate within the provisions of the treaty. We do not propose to abrogate any provision of the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. There is where we differ. The Senator has a right to insist that he is within the provisions of the treaty, and while the Senator has agreed that the clause he has just read was in violation of the treaty, yet in the bill he asks us to vote for he has incorporated that clause.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say that it was in violation of the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought you did.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said it was abrogated and repealed by the treaty. That is what I said, and that is what I say yet.

Mr. FORAKER. In other words, how is it abrogated, except only that the treaty is inconsistent with it, as it might well be?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like right here to say that section 3 of the amendment which I proposed gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to change such rules and regulations as he may believe necessary to execute the treaty of 1894, and I think that the Secretary of the Treasury can, without a violation of that treaty, make rules which will, to all intents and purposes, exclude laborers and admit those persons who belong to the exempted classes.

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly he can; but I do not want to pursue that matter further. Yet there is this remark appropriately to be made, suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], that if the treaty abrogated the law, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] quoted, then the enactment of the law which he proposes would, of necessity, as being the latest legislation, abrogate the treaty. So, then, we shall have no longer the treaty of 1894, and then, "Where would you be at?" At any rate, back to the treaty of 1880, if not back to the treaty of 1868, under which everybody could come in.

No, Mr. President. There is just one safe way to proceed, and that is the way of honor, which is also the way of interest, within the treaty, and in such a way as to retain the friendship of China, where we have such great commercial interests at stake. To do that we are all agreed that Chinese laborers should be excluded, and we do not care how drastic the provisions may be in that regard so they are within the limitations of reason. We must also all be agreed that we have a treaty, under which, at least, certain classes of educated men are entitled to come to this country.

I claim that everybody is entitled to come who is not a laborer; but at any rate, as to those classes named, I insist that we shall keep faith; that we shall maintain our honor, and that we shall by doing so maintain the respect of the world and the friendship of China. I contend that nothing we can do in this matter will so subserve the interest of the wage-worker in this country as to maintain relations that will enable us to extend indefinitely our markets in China. Cut off those markets and you cut down the pay rolls, and that I oppose.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when this bill was read I asked to have section 39 passed over. I should like now to offer amendments to that section and have it disposed of as the other sections of the bill were disposed of.

On page 40, line 3, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "two" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for each of said Chinese persons;" so that, when amended, it will read:

That the master of any foreign vessel which shall bring to the United States in the crew of such vessel, or otherwise in its service, any Chinese persons not entitled to entry, shall be required to execute a bond satisfactory to the Treasury Department, in the sum of $10,000, the condition of said bond being that none of such Chinese persons shall be permitted to land from said vessel for any purpose whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. In further amendment of that section I move to strike out all after line 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out in section 39, page 40, line 11:

And it shall be unlawful—

Mr. LODGE. There is no need of reading the amendment proposed by the committee, because by striking out the section the amendment proposed by the committee falls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator to be to strike out the words between lines 12 and 19, inclusive?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I ask that the words to be stricken out may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, beginning in line 12, on page 40, section 39, as follows:

And it shall be unlawful for any vessel holding an American register to have or to employ in its crew any Chinese person not entitled to admission to the United States, or into the portion of the territory of the United States to which such vessel plies; and any violation of this provision shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $2,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts explain the effect of that amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment proposes to strike out what is known as the seamen's clause.

Mr. PATTERSON. To that I object, Mr. President. I hope no vote will be taken on these amendments until the bill comes up on Wednesday under the agreement.

Mr. LODGE. We have voted on the rest of the committee amendments, and this is a reserved amendment of the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not understand that this is a committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. The clause was passed over, not being a part of the bill that has been dealt with. All the rest of the bill has been dealt with, and this carries a committee amendment. I did not say the amendment I have offered was a committee amendment, though the chairman of the committee has no objection to my amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. This is not a committee amendment. The amendment has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I object to the matter being voted upon now, until all the amendments can be discussed on Wednesday, when it was agreed the vote should be taken. We want to have a record vote upon the amendment that strikes out the seamen's clause, and we want to have an opportunity to debate it under the rule as the rule was announced.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to allowing my amendment to be pending. There is an amendment, offered by the Senator from Vermont, of a similar kind pending; but all of the bill has been perfected by the committee except this section, which was passed over at my request and at the request of the chairman of the committee, who said he would like to have the first revision of the bill completed to-day. I called it up in order to dispose of the only part of the bill that had not been read and dealt with. Of course, my motion can be voted down very easily, if Senators so desire.

Mr. PATTERSON. I object to voting upon that amendment now.

Mr. TELLER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the voting was to commence at a certain hour on Wednesday. Of course, the questions that are not controverted might be taken up at any time, but controverted questions are, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to be acted upon on Wednesday. They can not be voted on now except by unanimous consent, as I understand the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if there is objection, I am perfectly willing the amendment shall go over. I do not wish to force a vote upon it now; I have no desire to insist upon it; but let the amendment remain pending.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment remain pending, of course. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to line 11, on page 40. There are two immaterial amendments there that perhaps it might be as well to perfect now.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; those are two committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 39, on page 40, line 11, before the word "vessel," it is proposed to strike out the word "the" and insert "said," and after the word "vessel" to strike out "concerned."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not wish to debate this bill, but as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has spent much time over one phase of it, and has insisted that under existing law everybody is exempt except laborers, I wish to say that such has not been the interpretation of the law by the Department charged with its interpretation. The Treasury Department submitted to the Law Department of the Government—to the Attorney-General—the question as to the meaning of the act. By a well-established rule of practice in this country, when the Attorney-General renders a decision, it is as binding upon the Department requesting it as the decision of the Supreme Court. It is the rule that when the head of a Department calls on the Attorney-General for an opinion respecting a particular subject-matter, the head of the Department must follow that opinion. The Attorney-General was called upon for an opinion respecting this matter. I think the Senator from Ohio will see that the Attorney-General does not agree with him in the view that the only exclusion of Chinese immigrants was of laborers.

Mr. FORAKER. What Attorney-General?

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember who it was, but the Senator will be able to ascertain very readily when I read the opinion.

Mr. FORAKER. I cited the opinion of the Attorney-General in 1898. I said the Attorney-General then had given a certain opinion; but down to that time the ruling had been to the contrary, and the Senator will so find.

Mr. TELLER. If that was the case—I could not hear all the Senator said, for there was some confusion in the Chamber and he had his back turned to me during a good portion of the time he was speaking—that became the law of the Department, and that is the law to-day. If the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be adopted instead of the bill, unless by some provision of this act we reverse that decision, it will remain the law for the government of the Department. Let us see what the regulations of the Treasury Department say:

12. Chinese persons known as "traders" should not be allowed to land in this country, even though they submit the certificate prescribed by section 6 of the act of July 5, 1894.

Now, these are the words of the Attorney-General:

The true theory is not that all Chinese persons may enter this country who are not forbidden—

That is the theory of the Senator from Ohio—

but that only those are entitled to enter who are expressly allowed. Collectors of customs are directed to admit only Chinese whose occupation or station clearly indicates that they are members of the exempt class of Chinese named in Article III of the treaty with China, viz: "Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure," and to deny admission to Chinese persons described as salesmen, clerks, buyers, bookkeepers, accountants, managers, storekeepers, apprentices, agents, cashiers, physicians, proprietors of restaurants, etc. (Opinion of Attorney-General, July 15, 1898; S. 19077.)

There is a case, which I have not at present before me, in which, in 1899, the court of appeals of the ninth circuit rendered an opinion that is in keeping with that decision of the Attorney-General. I have not the case before me, but I examined it the other day.

Mr. President, I do not know that I correctly understood the Senator from Ohio, but I understood him once to say that we had not the power to abrogate a treaty by legislation. I think he afterwards corrected that statement.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; I said just the contrary. I said we had the power to abrogate a treaty, and that if we legislated inconsistently with the treaty it would be in effect an abrogation of it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator spoke of this as an illegal proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. If I did so, I used the word inadvertently, but I think I corrected myself and said I meant that it was in violation of treaty rights which I understood everybody wanted to maintain; that I did not understand that anybody wanted to abrogate a treaty. The contention was whether or not it was within the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. TELLER. It was my contention the other day and I contend now that there is no violation of the treaty in this bill; that is to say, there is no exclusion of anybody who could be admitted under the treaty. All there is in this bill is an application of what is in the treaty, a provision for carrying out the treaty, by which the Treasury Department may determine what is the character of the applicant, whether he is a merchant or whether he is not a merchant. As I said the other day, the Chinese Government when they made this treaty knew exactly what our definition of a merchant was in our statute, and I have not heard that they have ever complained of it.

Mr. President, there is not ordinarily anything improper in Congress abrogating a treaty. That must depend upon whether or not a treaty ought to be abrogated. If it ought to be abrogated, we have the power to abrogate it; so the courts have declared. I recall that in 1879, after a very thorough discussion of this question here on the first bill that we ever passed to exclude Chinese, the question came directly upon a bill from the House of Representatives, not to exclude Chinese, but to abrogate and set aside the Burlingame treaty. I want to read the list of names of those who voted "yea" on that question. I said the other day that I would not read it, but I am going to read now the names of some of the men then in the Senate who voted to abrogate that treaty; who not only recognized our right to do so, but our power to do so and the propriety of doing so at that time. This was on the passage of the bill. I will read the names in the order in which they occur. They are as follows:

ALLISON of Iowa, Bailey of Tennessee, Bayard of Delaware, Beck of Kentucky, Blaine of Maine, Booth of California, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Coke of Texas, Dennis of Maryland, Dorsey of Arkansas, Eaton of Connecticut, Eustis of Louisiana, Garland of Arkansas, Gordon of Georgia, Grover of Oregon, Hereford of West Virginia, JONES of Nevada, Kirkwood of Iowa, Lamar of Mississippi, McDonald of Indiana, McPherson of New Jersey, Maxey of Texas, MITCHELL of Oregon, MORGAN of Alabama, Oglesby of Illinois, Paddock of Nebraska, Patterson of South Carolina, Plumb of Kansas, Ransom of North Carolina, Sargent of California, Saunders of Nebraska, Sharon of Nevada, Shields of Missouri, Spencer of Alabama, TELLER of Colorado, Thurman of Ohio, Voorhees of Indiana, Wallace of Pennsylvania, and Windom of Minnesota—39 yeas. You have heard me read the name of Thurman of Ohio, who was not only a famous lawyer, but a famous Senator of this body, and the name of Bayard of Delaware, who afterwards became Secretary of State.

Mr. President, I am not ashamed to have my name enrolled with that list of names. I want to insist that there is just as much right to abrogate a treaty by Congress as there is by the Executive and the Senate to make a treaty in the first place, and that every nation who treats with us knows what our power is in that particular. The Supreme Court has repeatedly so held. Whenever we think it is to our interest to abrogate a treaty, we ought to abrogate it. I do not say we should abrogate every treaty. I think if we could get modifications of a treaty, as a rule, that would be the best form of procedure; but we could not get a modification of the Burlingame treaty by the ordinary methods of modifying a treaty. It was only when China knew that Congress intended to exclude her people that she agreed upon the terms on which they might be excluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, by a whispered suggestion the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], when he was speaking about the trade with China, was led to make a remark upon my statement that the share of the United States in the trade with China was only about one-tenth of that of Great Britain. The fact, as I understand it, is that it is about one-tenth of the trade of China with all other nations. I want to make that correction.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 14, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 12, was read and approved.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Monday be set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia instead of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, this being District day, asks that next Monday, a week from to-day, be set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MOBILE, JACKSON AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12452) granting to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to use for railroad purposes the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held for light-house purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of provisions hereinafter contained there is hereby granted to the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company the right to build and construct wharves, docks, piers, and other structures for use in the operation of its railroad upon the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., and now held by the United States for light-house purposes, and to lay its tracks upon and over said wharves, docks, and piers: Provided, however, That at least 300 feet of said wharves, docks, and piers shall be designated and set apart, subject to the approval of the Light-House Board, for the exclusive use of the United States for light-house purposes, which said wharves, docks, and piers so designated and set apart shall be maintained and kept in repair by the said railroad company, and the water approaches thereto kept dredged at the United States dredged channel depth without cost to the United States.

SEC. 2. That within fifteen days after the approval of this act the said railroad company shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury complete plans showing the wharves, docks, and piers to be constructed, upon which shall be designated the portion of said proposed wharves, docks, or piers to be set apart for the use of the United States as provided in the first section of this act, said plans, in so far as said wharves, docks, and piers are to be erected upon the lands of the United States, to be approved by the Light-House Board.

SEC. 3. That within thirty days from the approval of the plans as hereinbefore provided the said railroad company shall commence the construction of the said wharves, docks, and piers, and shall within five months from the commencement of the said work have completed and ready for use by the United States that portion of the said wharves, docks, and piers designated as hereinbefore provided for the use of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the United States shall have free access at all times across the tracks of said railroad company by the most convenient route, to be determined by the Light-House Board, for pedestrians, drays, and wagons, for light-house purposes, to the end of the wharf or pier designated as hereinbefore provided: Provided, however, That the United States shall have the right at any time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to take possession, for public purposes, of said tract of land and the wharves, docks, piers, and other structures so built and erected upon the land of the United States, and the United States shall thereafter make the said railroad company just compensation for the said structures so made upon the land of the United States by the said railroad company, and so taken by the United States, and said compensation shall be paid as soon as the amount thereof may be determined in the manner hereinafter provided. Should the Secretary of the Treasury and said railroad company be unable to agree as to the amount to be so paid by the Government, either party may bring proper proceedings in the circuit court of the United States at Mobile, in the State of Alabama, to ascertain and determine the amount of the liability of the United States: And provided further, That should the United States repossess itself of said land on account of failure of the railroad company to comply with the terms and provisions of this act, then the United States shall not be required to compensate the railroad company for said structures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have this bill debated before I determine whether I will object or not. I desire to present the facts to the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to its consideration now?

Mr. CORLISS. I desire to be heard on the bill.

The SPEAKER. If consent is given, it is open to debate, as the gentleman understands.

Mr. CORLISS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a few questions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that this land was purchased by the Government of the United States many years ago?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Seventy years ago.

Mr. CORLISS. For the purpose of giving the Light-House Board proper terminal facilities at this point?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is true. That was done seventy years ago.

Mr. CORLISS. And that Congress has authorized this railroad company to obtain this land, under a special act, by exchanging this piece of land for any other point or place upon the river acceptable to the Light-House Board.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That is true. A bill was passed to that effect in 1896, and every effort has been made by the railroad company to make that exchange.

Mr. CORLISS. And is it not true that the Light-House Board have selected a point that will be satisfactory to them, and has not the railroad company refused to buy it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. It is true that the Light-House Board selected a point, the value of which is said to be $50,000, and the railroad is unable to buy that property and pay $50,000 for it when this property in question here is estimated to be worth $2,500.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it not true that the railroad company have failed to carry out the provisions of the prior act, but have gone on and built their road and prepared to use this very point for transportation purposes, ignoring the privilege extended by act of Congress heretofore?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; that is not true. The railroad company have made their plans and specifications for the purpose of submitting them to the Treasury Department, and they have been so submitted, and the Light-House Board and the railroad company have been before the Secretary of the Treasury, who has decided in favor of the railroad company and in favor of the commerce of the city of Mobile.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it not true that the Light-House Board have protested against the sacrifice of this property by Congress, demanding that it be reserved as a public necessity to them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. My understanding is that the Light-House Board have not protested. On the contrary, the Light-House Board are under the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury has decided in favor of this bill. In fact, the bill as drawn is approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury and myself, and not only meets the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but has his hearty approbation.

Mr. CORLISS. Does not the gentleman admit that the Light-House Board reported to the Secretary of the Treasury emphatically against the provisions of the bill and the taking away of this property from that Board, but declared that it was necessary for their use?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Not in the language in which the gentleman puts it. The objections of the Light-House Board are presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which reported this bill.

Mr. CORLISS. And did not the representative of the Light-House Board appear before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and there protest, in the presence of the gentleman from Alabama, against this bill in its present form?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The representative of the Light-House Board appeared twice before that committee, and the committee reported in favor of the bill unanimously, after hearing both sides.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I have been personally requested to let this bill pass. I do not wish to stand here objecting to the interests of the constituents of members upon this floor, but I desire to record the fact that this property was purchased years ago for the Light-House Board; that it is important for the Light-House Board to hold it; that the railroad company have come to Congress before this time and obtained an act authorizing them to exchange this property for another piece upon that river which would answer the purpose of the Light-House Board; that the railroad company have failed to carry out the provisions thereof, but instead have gone on in disregard of that act and constructed their tracks, depending upon getting control of this property by some other means than that provided in the former act of Congress.

And now, Mr. Speaker, they come here again and ask Congress to enact that this property shall be turned over to them so that they can use it for railway terminal purposes. Under the terms of this bill they will have entire possession of the property now controlled by the Government, and in consideration they simply give the Light-House Board, away out on the end of the pier, a small space for light-house purposes, wholly inadequate, compelling the employees of the Light-House Service to pass over the dangerous tracks of the company and over a long pier in order to reach their storehouse. I say to members on this floor that this bill ought not to become a law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EVERETT HARBOR, WASHINGTON.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 56, providing for a modification in the adopted project for the improvement of Everett Harbor, Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, there is another amendment, to make it more clear, which should be made in line 11, before the word "take," to insert the words "the Secretary of War may."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 11, before the word "take," insert the words "the Secretary of War may."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COURT-HOUSE AND JAIL, SANTA CRUZ COUNTY, ARIZ.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8752) authorizing the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz County, Ariz., to issue bonds for the erection of a court-house and jail for said county.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz, Territory of Arizona, is hereby authorized to issue bonds on said county in the sum of $5,000 for the construction of a court-house and jail for said county and vaults for the preservation of its records.

SEC. 2. That said bonds may be in such denominations as the said board may prescribe and shall bear not more than 5 per cent interest per annum, and shall not be sold for less than their par value. Said bonds shall be made payable in thirty years, with an option on the part of the county to pay any or all of them after ten years from the date of their issue.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of paying the interest on said bonds as it becomes due and provide for a sinking fund to pay said bonds the said board of supervisors shall levy and cause to be collected, as other county taxes are levied and collected, a sufficient tax on the assessable property in said county as will meet the interest as it falls due and provide a reasonable sinking fund to pay said bonds when due.

SEC. 4. That said bonds shall be printed with interest coupons attached thereto; each coupon shall represent one year's interest on the bond, and when the interest represented in a coupon is paid the coupon shall be detached from the bond and placed by the treasurer with his other vouchers before the board of supervisors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UTAH SCHOOL INDEMNITY LANDS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13025) to make the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 23, 1891 (26 Stat., 796), applicable to the State of Utah.

Be it enacted, etc., That all the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 23, 1891, which provides for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated for other purposes, be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the State of Utah, and the grant of school lands to said State, including sections 2 and 32 in each township, and indemnity therefor, shall be administered and adjusted in accordance with the provisions of said act, anything in the act approved July 16, 1894, providing for the admission of said State into the Union, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. That wherever the words "sections 16 and 36" occur in said act, the same as applicable to the State of Utah shall read: "sections 2, 16, 32, and 36," and wherever the words "sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections" occur the same shall read: "second, sixteenth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth sections," and wherever the words "sections 16 or 36" occur the same shall read: "sections 2, 16, 32, or 36."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of section 2 the following: "and wherever the words 'two sections' occur the same shall read 'four sections.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McRAE. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if this bill enlarges the amount of the grant for school purposes for Utah in any way?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, sir; it does not enlarge the grant. Under the enabling act by which Utah was admitted into the Union, in view of the fact that it is a mountainous State, there was granted to it four sections for school purposes instead of two. It was found in a large number of instances the land was barren and mountainous, and was therefore valueless for cultivation.

Nine-tenths of our lands or more is mountainous and of practically no value except for grazing purposes, and for that reason it was recognized that Utah ought to have four sections of land instead of two. Under the act of 1891, which by this bill is made applicable to the State of Utah, only two sections are mentioned, because only two sections were granted the other States. This bill has been approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, concurs in the language of the act by which it was extended to cover the four sections instead of two.

Mr. McRAE. Then, if it does not enlarge the grant made by the enabling act, what does the State get by it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Simply as a matter of administration—

Mr. McRAE (interrupting). What is the substantial change in the law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The act by which Utah was admitted into the Union provided for the selection of indemnity lands in certain cases. Now, that act was passed in 1894—

Mr. McRAE. I understand that; but there was also in the enabling act a provision for indemnity school lands. Now, what is the substantial difference between the two laws as to the selections?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to state to the gentleman that in the act of 1891 there is a provision, for instance, that where these school sections are within an Indian reservation that the State need not wait until the reservation is opened, but may select school-indemnity lands in place of them. There is a provision in the act that where the sections are missing, either in whole or in part, that indemnity lands may be selected for them. These two provisions are not in the enabling act of Utah, but are in the general act of 1891, so that the result is that every other public-land State may select indemnity lands where the school lands are either within the limits of a reservation or found to be missing by reason of some natural condition, like the existence of a lake, except in the case of Utah; and this simply makes applicable to the State of Utah the provisions that prevail as to the other public-land States.

Mr. McRAE. Is there not also another benefit your State gets by this bill? Is it not true that under the enabling act you must select your indemnity lands in not less than quarter sections nearest to the lands lost, whereas by this act you can take it in as small subdivisions as 40 acres?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not so understand it. If so I see no reason why Utah should be put upon different conditions from other public-land States.

Mr. LACEY. Is there not also this: You are required to select the lieu lands near by, adjacent to, instead of at a distance from the school lands?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am glad the gentleman from Iowa called my attention to that fact. Utah was constituted as a Territory something like fifty years prior to its admission into the Union as a State in 1896. The valley lands were settled throughout the Territory, as they were more valuable, and therefore the more valuable school lands had been taken up and settled upon. Now, under the provisions of the enabling act we must select lands as nearly contiguous to the school lands for which they are taken as we can possibly. Now, the same cause which induced settlement upon the school lands in the fertile valleys, because they were the most valuable lands, also induced settlement upon the adjoining valley lands, and when we undertake to select the most nearly contiguous lands to the school sections, for which they are taken as indemnity, we are driven into the mountains.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not catch the reason given why Utah did not get the benefit of these sections when admitted into the Union.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The reason was that in preparing the enabling act for Utah the gentlemen who drafted the bill took the provision from the enabling act of some State admitted prior to 1891, and overlooked the provisions of the act of 1891.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California presents the report of the committee of conference on the Post-Office appropriation bill, which the clerk will report.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, as there is a statement accompanying the report, I would ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read. Without objection, this course will be pursued. The Chair hears none.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 32, 33, 37, 39, and 40.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 29, 31, 34, 35, 36, and 38 and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "edition" and insert in lieu thereof the word "editions;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 4, strike out lines 7 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Postmaster-General is hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress as soon as possible the advisability and practicability of purchasing and adopting a uniform metal lock box, at a price not to exceed 50 cents, for the purpose of selling the same to patrons on rural free-delivery routes at cost;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 4, line 24, strike out the words "less than $100 nor;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The statement of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon in the accompanying conference report on each of the Senate amendments, as follows:

The Senate made 40 amendments to the bill, producing a total increase of $307,158.60. An increase of $500,000 is made in the provision for pneumatic-tube service, $45,100 in officials for the rural free-delivery service, $55,000 for printing, binding, and distributing new edition of Postal Laws and Regulations, $7,000 for two additional inspectors, and $58.60 for claims.

By the action of the conferees the Senate recedes from amendments involving an increase of $52,158.60.

The effect of the action of the committee on amendment numbered 1 is to permit the Department to have the new editions of Postal Laws and Regulations and Digest to accompany the same prepared for distribution and make available the amounts appropriated for such service in previous acts.

Amendments numbered 2 to 26, inclusive, relate to increase in force and increase in salaries of rural free-delivery officials, as follows: Increase in salary of special agents in charge of divisions from $2,400 to $2,500, and increase in number from 7 to 10. Increase in salary of clerks at division headquarters from $1,200 to $1,400 for the highest grade, and increase in number of 12 for all grades. Increase in number of highest grade of special agents from 15 to 30, and rearrangement of the grades so as to increase the salary of the lowest grade from $1,300 to $1,400. Increase in number of route inspectors from 75 to 85. The amount of per diem allowance was increased to meet the increases referred to. From all of which amendments the Senate receded.

The effect of the action of the committee on amendment numbered 27 is to strike out the provision inserted by the Senate directing the Postmaster-General to purchase rural mail boxes at 50 cents each and dispose of same to patrons at cost and insert a provision directing the Postmaster-General to investigate said subject and report to Congress as soon as possible the advisability and practicability of so doing.

Amendment numbered 28 provides for the prosecution and punishment of those who destroy or steal from rural letter boxes, and the action of the committee in respect thereto is to strike out the minimum fine for such offense.

Amendment numbered 29 permits special agents, route inspectors, and examining inspectors in rural free-delivery service to administer oaths, and is agreed to.

Amendment numbered 30 permits rural carriers to administer oaths, and the action of the committee is to strike out such provision.

Amendment numbered 31 makes the appropriation for printing facing slips, card slide labels, manifold books, etc., available for the registry service, and is agreed to.

Amendments numbered 32 and 33 are claims—one for carrying the mail on a certain route and the other for payment of a post-office order. They are both stricken out.

Amendments numbered 34 and 35 provide for the establishment of a pneumatic-tube service, and appropriate therefor for the ensuing fiscal year $500,000, the Postmaster-General not being permitted, prior to June 30, 1904, to enter into contracts for this service which will aggregate an annual expenditure in excess of $800,000. The provisions of this amendment are identical with those contained in a bill recently reported favorably by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House, with the exception that the limitation of 8 inches for the diameter of the tubes is eliminated. Your committee have agreed to the amendment as incorporated by the Senate.

Amendment numbered 36 enables the Postmaster-General to pay the sum of $1,000 to the legal representatives of railway mail clerks killed or who may die from injuries received while on duty, and your committee agreed to the same.

Amendment numbered 37 provides for the extension of special facilities from Washington to Jacksonville, Fla., in addition to the provision providing for such service from Washington to New Orleans. The Senate receded on the same.

Amendment numbered 38 permits the Postmaster-General to have special-delivery and adhesive postage stamps manufactured in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing without advertising for bids therefor, and your committee agreed to the same.

Amendments numbered 39 and 40 provided for the appointment of two inspectors in the office of the assistant attorney-general of the Post-Office Department and appropriated $7,000 therefor. The Senate receded on the same.

The bill as it passed the House carried $137,916,598.75.

The bill as it passed the Senate carried $138,523,757.35.

The bill as agreed to by conferees carries $138,471,598.75.

E. F. LOUD,

GEO. W. SMITH,

CLAUDE A. SWANSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the bill carries now for pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. LOUD. Five hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement to the House in regard to the only two amendments which are of much importance to which the committee agreed. You will note that the increase we have agreed to is about $550,000 or a little over. Fifty-five thousand dollars is simply a reappropriation of money for printing the postal laws and regulations. Five hundred thousand dollars is for the pneumatic-tube service for the coming year, and in explanation of that I will state that the Post-Office Committee had under consideration the advisability and practicability of again permitting the use of the pneumatic tube in the larger cities of the country.

The opinion of the committee has been for some years that the service as established was of such an extravagant character that it should not be continued. We then took under consideration the question of so safely guarding the pneumatic-tube service, and recognizing, I believe, that the pneumatic-tube service, if it could be had reasonably enough, should be continued. We framed a bill and reported it to the House which provides that this service can only be instituted after due advertisement, and that such service should be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. We then provided that "no contract shall be entered into in any city for the character of mail service herein provided which will create an aggregate annual rate of expenditure, including necessary power and labor to operate the tubes and all other expenses of such service in excess of 4 per cent of the gross postal revenue of said city for the last preceding fiscal year."

There we put a limitation upon the extension of this service. To illustrate. If a city has receipts of a million dollars for the past fiscal year, then under this bill the pneumatic-tube service could be established providing for an expenditure of not exceeding $40,000.

Further, we provide:

No contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

The tube that was operated in the city of New York, under contract entered into some five or six years ago, provided for an expenditure of about $35,000 a mile, and your committee have limited it to $17,000. Recognizing that pneumatic-tube service was an aid to the postal service, if it could be safely guarded, your conference committee took the views of the Post-Office Committee, felt authorized in receding from the amendment of the Senate, and recommending to the House that it be concurred in.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. As I understand it, the provision in the conference report is a limitation of $17,000 per mile per annum. If I understood the gentleman correctly, the amount paid for the pneumatic tube in New York, when it was stricken out some years ago, was about $35,000 per mile.

Mr. LOUD. A little over $5,000.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In addition to that, is it not a fact that a large amount of expenditure was made by the Government in providing for power?

Mr. LOUD. I am not positive about that for New York. The company furnished some power, and I think the post-office department some power in the main office.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman can not give me any accurate information on that point?

Mr. LOUD. The expense of power would not be more than fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars a year, and would not increase the service in New York to a large extent.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. My impression is there was an annual appropriation in the sundry civil bill providing for power for the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. LOUD. There was in Boston.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And there was also in New York. It comes to my memory now. Now, is it provided in the gentleman's conference report that the expenses for power shall be met by those operating the pneumatic tube?

Mr. LOUD. I believe that the committee have drawn this provision so it will cover every possible item. The committee spent some time on this provision, and I will read it again. It is as follows:

That no contract shall be entered into in any city for the character of mail service herein provided which will create an aggregate annual rate of expenditure, including necessary power and labor to operate the tubes, and all other expenses of such service, in excess of 4 per cent of the gross postal revenue of said city for the last preceding fiscal year.

That no contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

I think we have covered as much as we could by language; at least, that is the intention. The same provision is in the next paragraph, which relates to the amount paid—

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I know it was proposed in the appropriation bill to build a new boiler for the purpose of providing power for the tube in New York. As I understand the gentleman, it would not be necessary to do that now.

Mr. LOUD. That is what the committee intended. There is one difficulty about post-office appropriations. We provide for one character of an expenditure, and another committee, of which the gentleman is a member, provides for other expenditures. Now, of course, if an appropriation committee shall provide for an expenditure of money for power, I do not think we could prevent it, although we have drawn this bill as carefully, I think, as it is possible to do it. I hope the Appropriation Committee will not attempt to make any provision to take care of any part of the pneumatic-tube service if it shall be installed as provided here.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] now in his seat.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman from California a question or two. The limitation proposed, as I understand, is 4 per cent. That is not much of a limitation, if the service extends for 2 or 3 miles.

Mr. LOUD. Four per cent in each city.

Mr. CANNON. What would it be in New York?

Mr. PAYNE. Not exceeding $17,000 a mile.

Mr. CANNON. Ah! That is a very important matter.

Mr. LOUD. That is another provision.

Mr. CANNON. Does the provision which the gentleman has just read provide, substantially, that all expenses for power and everything else shall, in the first place, be limited to 4 per cent, and, in the second place, shall not exceed $17,000 a mile?

Mr. LOUD. The provisions on this subject are embraced in two paragraphs, of which I have read only one. Another paragraph follows.

Mr. CANNON. Let us hear that.

Mr. LOUD (reading)—

No contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum; and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

Mr. CANNON. Then as to all cities that have 3 miles or more of tubes the limitation, as I understand, is conclusive; but if there should be a city that has less than 3 miles of tubes the $17,000 a mile, as I understand, would not be conclusive.

Mr. LOUD. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend from California that, in my judgment, he need have no fear of the Committee on Appropriations reporting anything not authorized by law in connection with this matter. We have not the power of legislation, nor would it be in order to appropriate anything not authorized by law.

Mr. LOUD. Sometimes things are "sneaked in," you know, when we do not see them.

Mr. CANNON. Sometimes they may be "sneaked in" from ignorance; but I say to my friend that he will search in vain, so far as I recollect, for anything providing for an enlargement of expenditure in connection with the public service that was ever "sneaked in" upon a bill from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOUD. Sometimes things get in, and we do not understand them ourselves. Let me say to the gentleman that in three or four or five or eight or ten years if the Treasury Department should urge upon the Appropriations Committee the necessity of the enlargement of a plant or the expenditure of money in a Government building the gentleman might not discover what that expenditure was intended to do, and though not thoroughly understanding the subject might recommend an appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will confess so far, and so far only, that the Committee on Appropriations has from time to time reported legislation in connection with appropriations; but it has always called attention to the matter in the report, and never, so far as I have recollection or belief, has reported anything that took on additional expenditures. What little legislation the committee has reported in connection with appropriations has, I think I can safely say, been invariably along the line of a reduction of expenditures and a more economical administration.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody]?

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. If I understand this conference report correctly, these limitations as to the payment per mile apply only where there are 3 or more miles of tube in operation?

Mr. LOUD. That is correct.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But that will not cover Boston, where there are not 3 miles in operation.

Mr. LOUD. The committee spent a great deal of time on this subject, and we examined quite a number of witnesses. These provisions were prepared, I will say, in the Post-Office Department; but the Department, I think, would hardly recognize them now, because we have put around them every additional safeguard that we possibly could.

When we considered the rate to be paid per mile for a tube of less than 3 miles in length, the best evidence that we had convinced us that if a tube in a city was only half a mile or a mile in length, with two expensive terminals and with an expensive power plant, $17,000 a mile was probably not sufficient. And again, we took into consideration that we must trust our officials. We can not lay down an iron-clad rule so strong that it will absolutely prohibit the initiation of service.

Now, let me say that so far as the city of Boston is concerned I believe the contemplated service there will cover much more than 3 miles.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. If they get all they wish, it certainly will. In Philadelphia how much tube is there in condition to be operated?

Mr. LOUD. About a mile, I think.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Then this limitation under existing conditions will apply only to the city of New York?

Mr. LOUD. That is true, under existing conditions.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And it makes the expenditure somewhat less than half what it was when the provision for this service was stricken from the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Of course, as I have suggested to the gentleman, we must depend upon the wisdom, the honesty, and the integrity of the Post-Office officials. If we do not or if we can not, we had better go out of business.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. LOUD. We consulted quite freely with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who, as the gentleman knows, is not the same man who was filling that position when the former contract was entered into.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I have all confidence in him.

Mr. LOUD. I have faith in the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, from some association with him ever since he has been in that office. I have never found him yet conducting the affairs of that office in any other manner than that in which a good business man would conduct his own affairs; and as we could not apply the limitation where there was less than 3 miles of tubing in a city we have arranged it in the manner now reported.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I think this is a very important matter, and under ordinary circumstances I might have wished to have the question reserved for further consideration; but the House very well knows the great confidence I have in the gentleman from California and his committee, and if he desires to dispose of this matter now I will have nothing further to say. It is an important matter—the gentleman I know agrees with me on that—and the House can give very little consideration to it under these circumstances. I had hoped that the matter of pneumatic-tube service might come up in some other way than on an appropriation bill, so that there might be a full and free discussion and an opportunity for amendment; but I think, under the conditions which gentlemen all know, I shall make no further observations.

Mr. CANNON. There is one word I want to understand. I think I understand it now, but I want to emphasize it in view of the gentleman's statement a few minutes ago. In all cities now, as I understand it, that will have less than 3 miles of pneumatic tubes the limitations that the gentleman refers to do not apply; so that if at the next session of Congress or some future session of Congress estimates should be submitted for power outside of this limitation they would be in order under the law.

Mr. LOUD. Technically, I suppose that that would be true, yet I should hope that the Post-Office Department would take what appears to a reasonable mind to be a mandate; that so far as is possible the conditions laid down here shall be absolutely complied with.

Mr. BINGHAM. There will be no extension until 1904, anyway.

Mr. HULL. Does not the 4 per cent limitation apply to all offices?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; that applies to all of them. In an office having receipts of $1,000,000—and there are not exceeding 12, I think, in the whole United States that have receipts in excess of that—they could only expend $40,000 for pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does this bill limit this to pneumatic-tube lines that are already in operation?

Mr. LOUD. There are none now in operation. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody], that if the House wants to discuss this matter it has the same opportunity here that it could have if we had disagreed to this amendment, because this is the only matter really upon which any question would arise. The House can dispose of it just the same. I do not want the House either to adopt or reject any measure that may be agreed to or disagreed to, coming from a committee of which I am a member, unless the House shall thoroughly and absolutely understand the question before them. Under ordinary circumstances, as one member of the committee on conference, I should not have agreed to this amendment upon an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody] knows well my views upon this question, but neither he nor I can continually stand in the way of progress without continually being run over. I have done all in my power in the past.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have stood in the way of progress, and we have not been run over up to the present time.

Mr. LOUD. Well, the gentleman and myself here tried to discontinue—

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And succeeded.

Mr. LOUD. Tried to discontinue a pneumatic-tube service which was conceived in sin. The gentleman well remembers that.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I quite agree to that.

Mr. LOUD. We were run over then.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman had not my assistance then. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I think I have had the gentleman's assistance ever since the pneumatic-tube service has been in operation.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I recognize that the pneumatic-tube service is a service that we must have. The people in this country, in the large cities, demand it; and when we realized that condition, we safeguarded it as carefully as we could possibly frame legislation and make it effective. Now, there is the whole case. The House is in possession of all the facts, and the House can discuss it or dispose of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I notice three provisions in this bill incorporated by the Senate—amendments 28, 29, and 30—which do not make an appropriation and which are administrative, and the report fails to show why those amendments were rejected. Two of them it occurred to me are quite important. One of them permitted the special agents to administer oaths, to swear witnesses, relieving them of the difficulty of carrying a notary public with them, for instance, when they are taking evidence. Amendment 30 provides that rural carriers may administer oaths to pensioners for their certificates. I suppose that was inserted because the rural routes frequently take away the fourth-class post-offices; and fourth-class postmasters, as I understand, have the right to administer oaths. This I assume was to take the place of that. I should like to know why that was discarded.

Mr. LOUD. Amendment 29 was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood from the reading of the report that it was not.

Mr. LOUD. Amendment 30 was disagreed to. Amendment 30 conferred the power upon rural carriers to administer oaths, and we thought that was going a little too far. We permit the route inspectors and agents to administer oaths, but we did not think it advisable to confer that power upon an ultimate forty or fifty thousand rural carriers.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a satisfactory explanation. I assumed that there was some very good reason that impelled the gentleman to reject the amendment. Why was amendment 28 rejected?

Mr. LOUD. Amendment 28 was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I misunderstood the reading of the report.

Mr. LOUD. Amendment 27 was also accepted with an amendment.

Mr. CANDLER. I heard something in the statement which I could not exactly understand in reference to the amendment by the Senate concerning the boxes along these rural-delivery routes. They passed a certain amendment, and it was changed to some extent in the conference committee. Will you please explain what the provisions are in reference to that as the bill stands now?

Mr. LOUD. Amendment No. 27 directed the Postmaster-General to purchase lock boxes at a price not exceeding 50 cents each and to sell them at cost to the patrons of the route. We amended that amendment by putting on a provision directing the Postmaster-General to report to Congress regarding the practicality and advisability of purchasing these boxes.

Mr. CANDLER. No further action will be taken in reference to these boxes until his report to Congress comes in on this subject?

Mr. LOUD. No; we did not consider it wise to adopt that amendment in the shape in which it was in the bill.

Mr. CANDLER. So the law will remain as it now is in reference to the boxes until that report comes in and Congress takes action in the premises?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. LOUD. If no other gentleman desires to ask any further question, I will ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ROBERT J. SPOTTSWOOD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7018) for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and that a conference be asked for.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GRAFF, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, and Mr. OTEY.

GEORGE C. TILLMAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 4071) granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman, with a House amendment thereto to which the Senate had disagreed and asked for a conference.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. BROWELL, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12765, to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for general leave to print upon the bill for three days after the final vote upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12765, and pending that asks unanimous consent for general leave to print on this bill, lasting for three days after the final disposition thereof. Is there objection?

Mr. APLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12765) to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, the bill pending before the House may be considered in two aspects—from the purely business standpoint of an economic measure in the interest of the commerce and industries of two nations, and from the standpoint of those weightier considerations of a high political and moral character. If the bill were even more important to this nation as a purely business proposition than it is, it would hardly deserve the great place it has taken in the public mind and in our own deliberations; and yet from that point of view it is of considerable importance.

It fixes the basis upon which is to be conducted the trade between two peoples, which to-day amounts in the aggregate to seventy-five millions a year, and which I believe, under the operation of the bill, would soon amount to more than three times that sum. It contains advantages to both nations without doing injury to either, as a whole, or to any interest in either. One party to the transaction is so strong and rich that even a greater benefit would hardly be perceptible, although the bill is in the direction of a sound national policy of great importance even to it, but to the young and now weak people—hereafter, I trust, to be prosperous and great—it comes as the very bread of life.

Let me call your attention to the general features of our trade with Cuba without reviewing the details. A glance at the figures of that trade will, I think, show the lack of accuracy in the observation of the gentleman from Nevada, who is usually accurate, that the trade which the bill would secure for our country would be in those articles which are produced by the trusts. The table of imports into the island of Cuba, which I hold in my hand, will prove the gentleman's error.

In the first subdivision, which bears the title of "Alimentary articles," Cuba in the year ending June 30, 1901, imported from the United States $3,789,320 of value, and from all other countries $12,924,071 of value. I do not know of a single article which enters to any material extent in that list which is under control of a trust. They are articles of food or drink, and the far greater part of them in value are the direct products of agriculture or the products of our fisheries. I would say that the preferential duty which is called for by this bill would probably secure to this country much the greater part of the thirteen millions of trade which under that item goes to other nations.

The next important heading embraces fibers, tissues, cotton and other clothing, boots and shoes, and wearing apparel generally. In that subdivision the total value of goods purchased from the United States amounts to only $1,127,160, while from all other countries there were purchased $10,186,029. Under the heading of "Miscellaneous," the most important item of which is cattle, there were purchased from this country $2,347,009, and from all other countries $6,772,868. The grand total of all articles contained in the exhibit of this portion of Cuba's trade amounts to $10,356,725 of goods purchased from the United States, and $34,930,183 of goods purchased from all other countries.

It is practically certain that instead of having such a small percentage of this trade, under the operation of the pending bill this country would secure 80 per cent of it all. That is a most important item in itself. It embraces, not as has been said—the products of the trusts—but it embraces in a great degree the products of our agriculture, our fisheries, and our common manufactures. Instead of selling, therefore, to Cuba about $30,000,000 of goods each year on the basis of her trade of the last fiscal year we should, under this bill, be selling her about $60,000,000. This is a trade that will enormously increase with the growth of the population and the prosperity of Cuba. In the present impoverished condition of that people they must be content with the bare necessities of life. If they are prosperous their consumption of the articles entering into their trade will greatly increase.

The objection to the bill which has been urged with the greatest force, and indeed the only one that can command our attention, is that its passage will be attended by an injury to a new and growing American industry, which would otherwise have before it a great future. If that objection were a sound one it would be fatal to the bill. I for one certainly could not see my way clear to support a measure which would throw a growing American industry to the wolves for the advantage of any other industry, however meritorious, in our own country or for the advantage of any other nation.

I am sure I should be the last to injure knowingly the beet-sugar industry, which has prospered so splendidly in Michigan, and which promises so much for the whole nation. I have no criticism to make of the Representatives of the States in which that industry is established, although I feel confident that they are mistaken in their belief that this bill would bring any harm to their industry.

I have listened to the eloquent speeches of my friend, the gentleman from Michigan, and of others who are upon this side of the Chamber, and share his views upon the subject, and I have been entertained even if not convinced by their efforts. They have read to the House from Republican platforms and the speeches of prominent Republicans declarations in favor of protecting the beet-sugar industry.

The sentiments they have quoted are all highly interesting but hardly pertinent to this debate. They tend too much to generalities. They proceed upon the theory that when the Republican platform, for instance, of six years ago declared in favor of protection to beet sugar it meant to declare in favor of 1.685 cents a pound, no more and no less, although that rate was not determined upon until a year afterwards. There is no question here of protection to the beet-sugar industry, certainly upon this side of the House.

I believe Republican members are unanimous in their desire to foster that industry. I think it should be supported, because we have such large areas in this country where the soil and climate are favorable to its development that after a few years of protection we shall be enabled to produce, at a less price than we are paying now, sufficient sugar at home to supply our own consumption. Even under the discouraging circumstances of the last year, when the overproduction, caused by a system of bounties abroad, created an abnormally low price, the output of our beet-sugar factories increased about 100 per cent.

The question, I say, therefore, is not whether we should protect the beet-sugar industry, but what would be a sufficient protection and whether it could be harmed by this bill. Will the reduction of the duty upon raw sugar coming from a single country to 1.35 cents a pound in the slightest degree endanger that industry? If gentlemen would address themselves to that proposition, they would discuss the question which long ago struck me as the vital one in this case. In my opinion the evidence is conclusive, not merely that which was produced before the committee, but that which springs from the very nature of the case itself, that the beet-sugar industry would not be weakened at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman believe that by any possibility the beet-sugar industry can compete on equal terms with cane sugar grown in the Tropics?

Mr. McCALL. I think so. I am coming to the general question between cane and beet sugar later.

The situation is so clear that I question whether the fright which has been so conspicuously displayed since this agitation began is anything more than a mere simulated and theatric fright. I shall cite to the House a few figures bearing upon the cost of producing beet sugar, from the highest beet-sugar authority, and then leave it to determine what possible danger there can be from the proposed reduction upon Cuban sugars. The beet-sugar forces are led by an able political general, as well as one highly accomplished in the business of manufacturing sugar.

Mr. Oxnard has been engaged in manufacturing beet sugar for about twelve years. After he had been nine years in the business, when he could speak from practical experience instead of mere theory, he stated that with beets at $4 per ton and an expense of working them of $3 per ton, there would be produced 250 pounds of sugar, the estimated amount from a ton of beets, for $7, and upon that expenditure of $7 for raw material and for labor the manufacturer would receive, at 4 cents per pound, $10 for the finished product, a profit of 43 per cent upon the cost of the labor and the material employed.

He said that in a factory which was in operation the cost of working the beets was less than $3 a ton and that in a proposed new factory the cost would be below $2 a ton, but for the sake of conservatism he adopted the estimate of $3 a ton. So that upon this estimate, which after nine years of experience in the business he declared to be conservative, there was this great profit to pay for the general expenses of the business and for dividends, although he was reckoning the finished product of refined sugar at only 4 cents a pound.

Now, take this estimate as a starting point, that refined sugar could be sold within the area of the beet-sugar country at 4 cents a pound with this great margin to cover depreciation and interest. Let us see at what price Cuban sugar, estimating upon the basis of the cost of its production, can be placed in that area. Colonel Bliss, our collector at Habana, has made a special effort to ascertain the actual cost of producing sugar in Cuba, taking, I think, eight different plantations, and he arrived at the conclusion that that cost is 2 cents a pound.

Mr. E. F. Atkins, a great business man who has been engaged in manufacturing sugar in Cuba for many years, and who has shown the same grade of capacity in that business that Mr. Carnegie has displayed in the steel business, and who is intimately acquainted with the conditions in Cuba, said to the committee that the average cost of producing sugar in Cuba was  $2\frac{1}{8}$  cents a pound. While Mr. Atkins was an interested witness, he was perfectly frank with the committee, and as between him and Colonel Bliss I should accept his testimony because of his more intimate personal acquaintance with the facts.

But I will take here Colonel Bliss's estimate, for the purpose of my comparison, and shall consider the average cost of producing sugar in Cuba without any profit to the producer as 2 cents a pound. This bill proposes a duty of 1.35 cents per pound upon Cuban raw sugar. That would be equivalent to an ad valorem duty, taking the actual cost of production as representing the value, of 67½ per cent. I know that some of the friends of beet sugar have displayed a sensitiveness when we mention an ad valorem duty.

They say that the Republican party has always denounced ad valorem duties. As a matter of fact, the duties enacted by the Republican party are largely ad valorem, and the objection which its members have urged against the ad valorem can not apply in this instance, because here the duty is specific; it must be so much per pound. There is no danger of undervaluation or of fraud upon the American Treasury or the American producer. There can be nothing odious in translating the specific duty into the equivalent ad valorem duty.

If, as some gentlemen who apparently never saw Cuba contend, sugar can be produced there at less than 2 cents a pound, then it is obvious that the equivalent ad valorem will be greater than 67½ per cent; and if the estimate were correct of a cost of 1½ cents a pound, which to my mind is a ridiculous estimate, then the duty proposed by this bill would be about 110 per cent of the cost of producing Cuban sugar. I propose, however, to follow the statement of our collector at Habana and estimate the cost of production at 2 cents a pound.

A great deal must be added to this—the freight and shipping charges from Cuba are about 0.35 of a cent a pound. That would bring the cost in bond in New York to 2.35 cents a pound. Now, if to that you add the duty proposed by this bill, the cost of transshipment, and the freight to the territory which the beet-sugar manufacturers naturally supply, you have 4 cents per pound, at the very lowest calculation, or a practical protection of 100 per cent, upon the cost of producing raw sugar in Cuba. Then, adding the cost of refining, you would get not merely 4 cents for your sugar in the beet-sugar territory, which, according to Mr. Oxnard's own estimates, would enable him to make 43 per cent upon the cost of labor and raw material expended, but would have at least 44 cents a pound.

I know Mr. Oxnard retreated somewhat in his testimony before the committee from the estimate which he made in 1899, but he admitted that the average cost of making refined sugars in his factories had been 4 cents a pound, so that in either event there would be for the refined product a very substantial profit indeed. Two cents a pound is a price which will not stimulate production in Cuba at all, because there is no motive for men to enlarge their production of an article which it does not pay them a profit to produce.

Should the price of sugar increase so that the Cuban would get more for his crop and therefore be encouraged to produce more sugar the American purchaser of Cuban sugar would have to buy at a higher price obviously than to-day and the protection accorded the beet-sugar industry would be correspondingly increased. I have proceeded upon the assumption that the world's price of sugar is the Habana price and that the protection of our producer would be simply the amount of duty that we added against Habana sugar. But the case is obviously stronger than that.

It is admitted by practically everybody upon both sides of this controversy that the world's price of sugar is the Hamburg price. We shall consume in this country during the present year about two and one-half million tons. Of that amount practically one-third is produced upon American territory, substantially another third will be brought from Cuba, and the remaining third or the great mass of about 800,000 tons must be purchased in the world's market.

So long as there is a considerable deficiency in our production the price for sugar in New York will be the Hamburg price, with the full freight and the full duty added, and the effect of remitting 20 per cent of our present duties to Cuba will be to add that much to the value of the products of Cuba.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Massachusetts will recall that Colonel Bliss in his statement before the Ways and Means Committee said that the Cuban planter would not get but 30 per cent of that.

Mr. McCALL. I am arguing now what I think will inevitably follow from the plainest economic principles, and I would like to have the gentleman, if he will give the House the pleasure of listening to him hereafter, show why a planter in Habana should sell his sugar for any less there than he could get in New York after he pays the freight and shipping charges to New York.

So that our beet-sugar producer would receive the full benefit of the protection of 1.685 cents per pound until such time as our consumption would be substantially supplied by our own product and by that of Cuba, a condition that can not possibly occur during the life of the proposed measure, or that there would be any reason to apprehend could occur if its life were protracted for ten years.

The testimony of the beet-sugar men themselves shows clearly that the proposed reduction upon Cuban sugar would not lessen the price of sugar to the consumer in this country in the least. If not, how could the beet-sugar industry be injured? Let me quote from Mr. Oxnard upon this point, because Mr. Oxnard was very specific. In his testimony before the committee, found on page 179 of the record, he said:

I do not believe that a small reduction of the tariff would reduce the price one penny to the consumer.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you call a small reduction?

Mr. OXNARD. Why, 10 to 20 per cent.

And 20 per cent is the amount of reduction proposed in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it reduce the price to the consumer?

Mr. OXNARD. I do not think it would reduce the price of sugar to the consumer, because you would have to go abroad to get such a large quantity of your raw material that the price of refined sugar would be fixed there plus the duty.

That is an unqualified admission of the principle underlying this entire case. So long as there must be a great mass of sugar bought by us in the world's market in addition to what we get from our own producers and from Cuba, the price of sugar in the central market of the United States will be the Hamburg price plus the freight plus the full duty. That can not be denied. It is admitted by the leader of the beet-sugar forces, and with that admission the whole case of a direct injury to the industry goes by the board.

But at this point the gentlemen interested in beet sugar become the guardians of the public and say that if the duty is reduced upon Cuban sugar the sugar trust will get the benefit of that reduction, and they do not propose to consent to any such a wicked transaction. This doctrine has the merit of novelty and implies the discovery of a new trait in human nature. It is in effect that a soulless corporation will as a rule pay one set of men more for a given article of common use than it could buy the same article for at the same time and in the same place from another set of men.

I think that it can be asserted without any unreasonable presumption that sugar of the same grade will at any given moment of time bring the same price in New York Harbor, providing it is handled by rational beings. Of course, the owner of any commodity is liable to be buncoed, but as a general proposition either buyer or seller will take advantage of the conditions which exist in his favor. I do not understand that anyone has ever claimed that there would be two ruling prices for sugar in New York at the same moment of time.

That being true, it would follow as a general proposition that the parity of price would be substantially maintained between ports having intimate trade relations with each other, like New York and San Juan and Hamburg. My eloquent friend from Minnesota has simply been quarreling with an axiom when he has taken the contrary position. It requires no long arithmetical computation on the floor of this House to disprove the proposition so obviously at war with one of the deepest principles of human nature.

Why should the owner of sugar in Porto Rico accept a less price in San Juan than he could get by shipping his sugar to New York? Why, again, does not the sugar trust get the benefit of the whole duty as against the producer of raw cane sugar in Louisiana—because that producer is said to have no other market? Of course the scarcity of sugar at one port—compared with the demand, the distance to the port of supply, and the temporary scarcity of freights, and considerations of that nature—will produce slight deviations from the parity, but these exceptions only prove the rule, and the infinitesimal divergencies which the ingenuity and the diligence of the gentleman from Minnesota led him to think he had discovered between New York and San Juan prices would only prove the rule if these divergencies, as a matter of fact, had existed.

The proposition of the gentleman is contrary to all the laws of trade and to all the laws of human nature. There will be one price for the same grade of raw sugar in New York at the same time, whether you pass this bill or whether you do not, and whether or not you pass it the Cuban planter will be able, if he has ordinary human sagacity, to get that price whenever he enters that market. Whatever obstacle you remove from his course in entering that market will inure to his advantage. I well remember that two years ago it was repeatedly asserted that the removal of the duties upon Porto Rican sugar would inure to the benefit of the sugar trust.

There were some of us who did not share that opinion, although I will admit that there were very few of us upon this side of the House, but I call to your attention the result of the experiment that we then tried, and I assert with absolute confidence that the result of granting free trade to Porto Rico has been that the Porto Rican sugar grower, and not the American trust, got the benefit of the removal of the duty. I think, therefore, it is entirely clear that there is no ground for the alarm which the beet-sugar interests display at the pending bill, and the case is so clear that, in my opinion, as I have previously said, that alarm is affected.

They have consistently contended from the start that the great octopus, the American sugar trust, was forcing through legislation here to stifle and crush its growing rival.

I do not think it is exactly fair to discredit the cause of Cuba by bringing in the sugar trust or by holding up the sugar trust as the beneficiary of this legislation. Of course we understand that the sugar trust is a bogey that it is always safe to batter, but I do not think that in the consideration of an economic question we should be frightened from looking at the facts as they are in the light of economic principles.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman understand that the sugar trust favors or opposes this legislation?

Mr. McCALL. Upon that point I do not understand whether they favor it or oppose it. I venture to say as a practical proposition that every member on this side of the House has received 10 pamphlets and 10 documents against this bill from the friends of beet sugar where he has received 1 pamphlet or 1 document from the sugar trust in its favor.

I for one decline now, as I did two years ago, to be frightened from the calm consideration of an economic measure by this conjuring with the octopus. The methods advised by some advocates of the beet-sugar industry in this particular connection do not commend themselves to my judgment. Having elected to consider the sugar trust, instead of the President, instead of the governor of Cuba, instead of the Secretary of War as the essential promoter of this legislation, some advocates of beet sugar propose to take off all the protection upon the business of converting raw into refined sugar in this country if they are compelled to accept the slightest reduction from the enormous protection which they themselves receive.

Now, I am not wasting any sympathy upon the sugar trust. I do not know whether the business of converting raw sugar into refined sugar is so established in this country that it can get along entirely without protection or not. If it could get along without protection and prosper, then we should have the sturdy competition, I am glad to say, of the producers of beet sugar; but if it could not get along and thrive, I say the people of this country are vitally concerned in having the business of the independent refining of sugar conducted in this country and not be turned over to the tender mercies of a highly-protected industry like that of beet sugar.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question in that connection.

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many persons are there employed now in the refining of sugar—I do not mean of beet sugar, but the cane sugar—in the United States?

Mr. McCALL. I do not know. I can not give the exact number.

Mr. HEPBURN. The number is very small, is it not?

Mr. McCALL. I am not familiar with the exact number. You are speaking, now, of the number of concerns and not the number of men?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I am speaking of the number of men employed in the industry of the refining of cane sugar or of imported sugar.

Mr. McCALL. I do not know, I would say, how many men there are employed.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have seen the statement that the refining process costs 1 mill per pound. Is that correct?

Mr. McCALL. I think that is probably very incorrect. I think that is probably something like the statement which has been made that sugar could be produced in Cuba at a cent and a quarter a pound.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It was testified before the committee, if the gentleman will permit me, that of the 1 cent additional charged by the sugar-refining company about five-eighths was the cost of refining and about three-eighths of a cent was profit.

Mr. McCALL. I understand that the cost of refining is something in excess of one-half cent, but I will admit that I am not competent to answer the gentleman upon that point.

Mr. METCALF. It was stated before the committee that the cost of refining was about half a cent a pound.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] has reversed the figures. As I understand, the testimony was that the cost was three-eighths and the profit was five-eighths.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; the testimony of Mr. Post was that the cost was 62½ cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him? In answer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], I will say that on page 395 of the testimony Colonel Bliss stated:

I think the most of the Cubans to whom I have talked agreed with me that if you were to give 50 per cent off, or 33½ per cent, or whatever you give, probably not more than 30 per cent at the very most would go to the planters, and the rest of it, whatever did not stay in the United States, would go to the laborer and the colono, the man who cultivates small fields of cane.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is on the supposition that his wages would be increased.

Mr. McCALL. Of course, that would increase the cost of producing sugar over the estimate made by Colonel Bliss; but I do not know of anything that is peculiar in the production of cane sugar that would have any worse effect upon human nature than the production of beet sugar. I do not think there is anything in the beet that would give men an immunity from that spirit of gain that prevails in all kinds of trade. I do know that the German beet-sugar cartel, which sells sugar for export at 2½ cents a pound and extorts 6 cents a pound from the German people, is something compared with which the American sugar trust, however wicked it may be, is an eleemosynary institution, and I prefer, and I think the people of this country prefer, to have the business of independent refining maintained in this country.

Now, if it can get along without any protection at all, all well and good; but I would suggest to the gentleman that there are people living in this country at a great distance from the beet, who do not regard that vegetable as sacred, and that they will not look with complacency upon a great protected industry like that with 67½ per cent, if it is to submit to the slightest reduction attempting in revenge to strike the protection entirely off from another competing industry.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts certainly does not propose to compare either the cartel or the bounty produced sugar of Germany with the beet sugar of our own country.

Mr. McCALL. I was not making any comparison except to this point, that some gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of beet sugar in Germany are robbing the German people; and now the gentleman goes on the theory that the beet-sugar people of this country are not going to get all they can out of their trade, that they are benevolent and charitable gentlemen, and that we have nothing to fear from them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has the gentleman ever heard any complaint about the sugar schedule until somebody wanted reciprocity with Cuba?

Mr. McCALL. Any complaint about the sugar schedule?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; complaint that it was too high—the tariff on sugar. I have heard complaints about other schedules—hides, steel, glass, and several other things—but I had never heard any complaint about the sugar schedule until we got ready for reciprocity with Cuba.

Mr. McCALL. I never heard any special complaint about the sugar schedule.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I never heard any.

Mr. McCALL. Of course there is always a general hue and cry about the differential, and there is also a general complaint about all tariff duties from which the sugar schedule is not exempt.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The differential is ample, is it not?

Mr. McCALL. Undoubtedly it is ample. I do not understand that anyone is asking for an increase. I say it may possibly be susceptible of reduction, but I say the gentleman would not be in a very noble and unselfish attitude if, representing an industry that has this enormous protection, which it is proposed possibly from his point of view to cut down slightly, he should say that he would cut down all the protection upon this other industry.

I suggest to the gentlemen that they are adopting neither a sound nor a safe method of legislative procedure when they propose, if their own protection in the case of a single country shall be reduced to 67½ per cent, that they will remove all protection from a competing industry.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Did not the debates both in the Senate and the House at the time the bill was passed expressly show that the rates were fixed on raw sugar and refined so as to build up the beet-sugar interests of this country?

Mr. McCALL. Undoubtedly. That question has been discussed here. I am not making an effort to give all the arguments and all the evidence in the particular speech I am making.

The climate and soil of Cuba are highly favorable to the growing of cane, and they are favorable to a great many other crops. It is significant that it was urged on behalf of the tobacco growers who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means that a reduction of the duty on tobacco would enormously stimulate its production in Cuba; that new lands would be given over to it, and that our own producer would be swamped. That prospect is about as reasonable as the fear that Cuba is going to rush into the production of sugar when it would cost her 3½ cents a pound to get the raw product into our market, a sum which is in advance of the price she receives at present. Certainly they can not produce tobacco and sugar from the same land at the same time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will my colleague permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not my colleague believe that the testimony shows that, with reasonable encouragement in the treatment of Cuba, in a very short time it can produce at least two or three million tons of sugar annually?

Mr. McCALL. Cuba, if she went to the full extent of her production, could at least produce—

Mr. TAWNEY. Not the full extent, but in the next five years.

Mr. McCALL. I do not think that there is anything that would be called testimony that would establish that proposition. I have no doubt that if you encourage it something might be done, but not enough to make it formidable. They raise tobacco and sugar, and they could not raise both tobacco and sugar on the same land at once.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask my colleague this question: Is it not a fact that all the witnesses conceded that at least within five years Cuba could, with free sugar, produce all the sugar that the United States consumes?

Mr. McCALL. I do not think all conceded that within five years that could be done.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question? Has the gentleman heard anyone state, either in the House or in the committee, that the production of sugar would be substantially increased during the next year, the period for which this bill is to run?

Mr. McCALL. Why, certainly not. Under the present prices there is no inducement to the people of Cuba to increase their crops, unless we suppose that they are going to extend the production of an article which they are now producing at a loss. They certainly could not greatly increase their crop during the life of this bill.

A recent writer has pointed out the partnership between sugar and slavery and how the monarchs of a few centuries ago would compare their ships freighted with sugar to the bees laden with the sweetness of the fields. The sugar, however, with which they were familiar was tropical or cane sugar. One member of the copartnership has gone. Slavery has practically vanished from the earth. A new industry has come into being. As a rule, when both beet and cane sugar are produced by free labor, beet sugar has the advantage.

As Mr. Oxnard has said, sugar is essentially an agricultural product. Fitted as we are for agriculture, and able to compete successfully with the whole world in the production of those things to which our soil and climate are adapted, the producers of America need have no fear of producing sugar against the world when their industry shall be established. With the abolition of the indirect bounties abroad and with the enormous protection of 1.68½ cents upon every pound of sugar, it is preposterous to suppose that our sugar producers can not maintain themselves in our markets.

What will the beet-sugar people do in the case of the annexation of Cuba? Suppose our agents there have after all told the truth? Suppose the present low price of sugar shall produce financial disaster, failure, distress, and want in Cuba, and that disorder ensues, and that this country may be compelled to take her in order to bring about her regeneration? What will become of the beet-sugar industry then? I confess it is hardly a satisfactory answer which gentlemen give to that proposition, to say to us grandly that we will face that crisis when we reach it.

It is a simple question: What will the beet-sugar industry do if Cuba is annexed? It will not meet the point to say that they will then have to produce sugar under a protected market and with severe anti-immigration and anticontract-labor laws, because the provisions of this bill will put upon Cuba, if she shall assent to them, our own contract-labor laws and will put her under our protected markets, so that practically all her supplies bought from other nations will be purchased in this market.

If our beet-sugar industry can not hold its own with Cuba with a specific duty equal to 67.5 of the cost of Cuban production, what will happen when Cuban sugar has absolutely free access to our market? The great threat to the sugar industry of this country does not come from this bill, but it will come from a failure to pass the bill. It will come from a condition which makes annexation necessary. Viewed, therefore, simply from its economic aspects as a measure to promote international trade, I think it is entirely clear that the pending bill will be for the interests of both countries and will injure no class of people in either nation.

As to the future of cane sugar in the United States, I can see little ground for optimism. It seems to me it can not stand beet-sugar competition at home when that industry shall be developed. People who are engaged in that industry, if they take a far look ahead, will prepare to use their fields for some other purpose. Cuba is one of the few countries in the world where cane sugar can be raised in competition with the beet sugar of other nations. They need only to plant their cane on the average once in every ten years.

In Louisiana it must be planted every two years at a cost, as was testified, of $20 an acre. It is a rational application of protection to develop those industries which we are by nature fitted to carry on, but a mere exotic industry which we are not fitted to carry on and which must be maintained by a perpetual tax upon the American people is something that does not come within any proper application of the doctrine of protection.

If the soil, the sunshine, and the air of Cuba will do work for the American people which those same natural agents refuse to do in our own country, it would be the grossest kind of waste for us to refuse to accept the benefit of those blessings and forever to put upon poor human nature the burden of doing the work which nature herself would do for us with her lavish hand. We have enough of avenues for the profitable employment of labor without taxing ourselves to maintain industries which can never be profitably maintained.

But there remain what, to my mind, are vastly the most important considerations underlying this bill, and those are the considerations of equity and duty which are involved, and also, I may add, those considerations of a high political nature which have reference not merely to some particular industry in this country or to our pecuniary interest, but to the future of the American commonwealth. The important reasons for this bill are those which rest upon moral obligations.

In our resolution which led to the Spanish war we absolved ourselves from the guilt of that war by calling upon mankind to witness the unselfishness of our motives, and we declared, first:

That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

And, fourth:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

There was no equivocation in our attitude. We went to war for the purpose of freeing Cuba, and declared that she was, and of right ought to be, free and independent; and we declared our purpose, as soon as the island was pacified, to leave the government and control of it to its people. One year ago when the pacification of the island was advanced, and the question arose as to the withdrawal of our troops, we passed the Platt amendment. I was one of those who thought that amendment scarcely compatible with the lofty declarations with which we embarked upon the war; but gentlemen with as keen a sense of national and personal honor as my own thought otherwise.

At any rate it was passed and it declared itself to be in fulfillment of the declaration which we had made with reference to the future of Cuba. It was not passed, therefore, in forgetfulness of what we had promised, but it was declared by us to be our interpretation of that solemn promise. Now, what did we say? We provided that Cuba should either insert into its constitution, or in an ordinance appended thereto, certain declarations. I will advert to the more material ones in connection with this bill:

I.

That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which may impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization, or for military or naval purposes, or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

II.

That said government shall not assume or contract any public debt, to pay the interest upon which and to make reasonable sinking-fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of the government, shall be inadequate.

III.

That the government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the government of Cuba.

V.

That the government of Cuba will execute and, as far as necessary, extend the plans already devised or other plans to be mutually agreed upon for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the Southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein.

VI.

That the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title thereto being left to future adjustment by treaty.

VII.

That to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defence, the government of Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

Now, gentlemen tell us that this leaves Cuba absolute freedom to make treaties of trade with other nations. Bear in mind that we have, right under our eyes, one illustration of the manner in which we have construed a promise made to the Cuban people. Look upon the Platt amendment as our interpretation of what the Teller resolution meant, and is there a gentleman upon this floor who would contend for an instant that Cuba could freely make a treaty with Germany or any other power by which that power would secure her trade as against us and that that transaction would go unchallenged by us? Treaties are not always kept when they are made between nations.

Suppose Cuba should make a treaty with Germany and she should not keep it. The rights accrued under that treaty might call for a display of force. How could that be made under the Platt amendment? What nation that did not wish to invite a quarrel with the United States, having in view the Platt amendment, would care to make such a treaty with Cuba? Suppose, again, that the trade should not, in our judgment, leave the Cuban government sufficient revenue to carry it on. Should we not intervene? There can be no doubt about it, that as practically construed Cuba, under the Platt resolution appended to its constitution and now a part of her organic law, falls in all international matters under the absolute predominance of the United States.

Will gentlemen assert that we have discharged all our obligations to Cuba when we set her out upon the highway of nations thus gagged and bound hand and foot, and that all that remains is for us hereafter to sing praises to our own virtue for making her nominally free? We have put ourselves under obligations which we can not disregard.

How have we treated the other islands wrenched from the sovereignty of Spain? We have given 25 per cent concessions to the Philippines, although they are at the other side of the globe, and not one American in a thousand ever heard of them before the war broke out.

We have given free trade to Porto Rico, which is a thousand miles away. But it is said they are a part of our country. But our Government has taken the position, in which I need hardly say I did not concur, that they were not entitled as of right to free trade with the United States, and that we had the power to determine in each instance what, if any, concessions should be made.

How does Cuba's case stand in equity compared with that of the Philippines? Cuba is at our doors. She guards a great stretch of our coast, the mouth of the Mississippi, and the Isthmian Canal. It was her cause that stirred the hearts of the American people. She is a part of us, not by the harsh fiat of war which, in defiance of the laws of nature, sets up an artificial and unnatural relation with incongruous peoples who live under another sky and who are not so far separated from us by the space of half the planet which divides us as by those more ineradicable differences in institutions, in race, and in civilization, but she is a part of us by those common interests which bind peoples together.

I know it is commonly said that destiny decrees that she should some day become an integral part of the American Union. Destiny is too often a mere synonym of unhallowed greed. For my part, I prefer to have her go on and flourish as an independent republic rather than to have her take a part in the Government of the people of the United States. Under the protection of this nation in foreign affairs, with the instability of the races which inhabit her, regulated and tempered by people of American birth, whom prosperity will attract to her in large numbers, I think she can flourish as an independent government in a way that will make her the model of the other Latin-American States. But if she is ever to become a part of us, it is far better that she should enter as a prosperous and contented member than through the door of starvation.

But I do not care to see the governing agencies of our great nation extended any farther toward the Tropics. Let me read to you from the utterance of a famous writer who unites the far-sighted vision of the historian with the sound judgment of the statesman. In a book just issued Prof. Goldwin Smith asks the question: "Does the white man in his overflowing philanthropy want a burden?" And then he proceeds to answer it:

He has it at his own door. If he is a member of the British Parliament, let him step out into Whitechapel or Houndsditch, or let him read the White Slaves of England, and see how in his own country the alkali worker, the nail maker, the slipper maker, the wool comber, the white lead maker, the chain maker live. In the United States the white man has a burden such perhaps as no other nation has been called upon to bear. * * *

To the black population of the Southern States is apparently soon to be added the black population of Cuba, while even the white population is not American or truly republican in character. Should expansion pursue that course, Santo Domingo and the West Indies, with their black millions and their alien civilization or barbarism, will probably be annexed. The Isthmian Canal will act as a lure to expansion on the continent southward.

The slave owners' dream of an empire extending south may thus be practically fulfilled. What, then, will become of the American commonwealth? One of two things apparently must ensue: either a radical change in the character of the nation and in the spirit, if not in the form of its institutions, or a second disruption. Have expansionists looked ahead? Have they made up their minds what direction their expansion shall take, and considered, if it takes a southern direction, what is likely to be the effect? The decision can not safely be left to traders, who are apt to care little for national character or for anything but the immediate extension of their trade.

If we are to have Porto Rico and Cuba and other tropical countries with their incongruous populations admitted to participate in the government of the American commonwealth, we must be prepared for a radical change in the character of our institutions. For the sake, then, of our own future, as well as for the sake of that new-born republic, let us pass this bill. Whatever the faults of the Cuban people, we must all admit the great patience and serenity with which they have acted during the last three years.

Let us now set them upon their course as a nation with the help and the encouragement contained in this measure. That little republic is the child of this great nation, sprung from her loins, and she appeals to our highest interests, to our tenderness, to our sense of justice, and to that high sentiment that makes men respond to the call of duty, and I trust that such an appeal will never be made to this Republic in vain. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. VAN VOORHIS having taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. CROOK, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 12, 1902:

H. R. 10363. An act to authorize the establishment of a life-saving station on Ocracoke Island, on the coast of North Carolina.

On April 11, 1902:

H. R. 6918. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas Bliss.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

The committee resumed its session.

[Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege some days ago, upon the floor of this House, to speak at considerable length in favor of Cuban reciprocity. I advanced at that time the reasons appealing most forcibly to me in behalf of freer trade relations between Cuba and our country. I have no desire now to repeat what I then said, but inasmuch as the pending bill has been completed and reported to the House since that time, and inasmuch as the arguments against reciprocity have become more well defined, I desire now to briefly supplement what I have already said, with some additional remarks on the subject.

The pending bill is not satisfactory to me in the small concession it makes to Cuba, and in the conditions it imposes upon her, nor does it contain as much tariff revision as I would like to see, and if I am given the privilege of doing so I shall vote to amend it, but if it can not be amended I shall vote for it in its present form, believing that it does offer some relief to Cuba and does tend toward freer trade relations between that island and the United States.

The situation in Cuba that demands relief at our hands has been so clearly stated so many times that I do not deem it necessary to more than briefly mention it now. The causes that have brought about this situation are twofold: In the first place, the bounty system so long in vogue in foreign countries, reenforced by the cartel, has so stimulated the growth of beet sugar that there is not only now an immense overproduction of sugar in the world, resulting in the reduction of the price of sugar to an abnormally low figure, but the cartel and the bounty system enable the foreign producer of sugar to put his sugar upon the market and sell it at less than the cost of production, a thing utterly impossible for the Cuban producer to do. The second cause of Cuba's present condition arises from the impoverishment of her people, growing out of her last war for freedom. Our own statistics show that her wealth has been reduced 75 per cent, and the facts show that fully three-fourths of her people are directly or indirectly dependent for a livelihood upon her sugar industry.

It necessarily follows, therefore, that for her to market her present crop of sugar, amounting to some 850,000 tons, at a price below the actual cost of production means absolute ruin and bankruptcy to her people, already overwhelmed with debt, as they have absolutely no means by which they can recoup themselves for the loss thus entailed upon them. It means not only ruin for the present, but for the future, as there will be no means with which to make the next crop and no inducement to make it. These people have appealed to the United States to aid them, not by making any donation to them, but simply by giving them the benefit of the markets in the United States for their products at a living price. It has been well demonstrated that the United States can do this, and do it by the loss only of a small portion of her large surplus revenue, and substantially without any injury to any producers in the United States.

The only question presenting itself to us is whether we shall grant this relief, and thereby extend our trade relations, or shall we refuse it, because, upon the one hand, it is claimed to be un-Republican to grant it, and, upon the other hand, claimed to be un-Democratic to grant it. In my judgment, the American people are not so much concerned in knowing whether or not the pending bill is un-Republican or un-Democratic as they are concerned in knowing that it grants sufficient relief to Cuba.

It seems to me that gentlemen who speak of Cuba and refer to Cuba as a foreign country are not entirely accurate. Cuba is not a foreign country to us in the sense that every other country not a part of our system is foreign. She is not foreign in the sense of distance, because she lies at our very door; and neither is she foreign in the relations that she bears to this country, which are such relations as no other country in the world bears to us. The concessions that she has made to us of parts of her sovereignty, which give us a certain supervision and control over her actions, and the concessions that she has made of valuable rights to us, make her, if not substantially a part of our system, at least one in whose welfare we are directly interested.

Gentlemen flippantly speak of the proposition to relieve Cuba as being purely sentimental. They might with more force have referred to the war that we waged for her freedom at a sacrifice of blood and immense treasure as being based upon sentiment. The truth is, however, that the justification for the war, as well as the justification for the proposed relief, is founded upon something more substantial than sentiment. The war between Cuba and Spain affected us in many material ways. It interfered with the rights of our citizens. It interfered with our trade. It was expensive to us. Among other expenses, it entailed the necessity of patrolling our coast to overtake The Three Friends, the Dauntless, and numerous other boats, charged with carrying contrabands of war to Cuba.

It interfered with us in many other ways, and it was this interference with our substantial interests, as well as a humane desire to confer freedom upon Cuba and to end the cruel and devastating war within her borders, that furnished the justification given by our Government for intervention. We have greater interests now to protect in Cuba than we had then. We have more interest now in seeing a stable and independent government in Cuba than we had then. And yet when it is proposed now for us to protect the substantial interests we have in Cuba by making a slight concession to her in our tariff rates, in order that she may live, a thing we can do at a tithe of the cost the war brought upon us, the proposition to do so is slightly referred to as being purely sentimental.

The avowed purpose and intention of the United States Government ever since the Spaniards were driven from Cuba has been to establish there a stable and independent government, as it was in duty bound to do. This "stable and independent government" is to take charge of the affairs in Cuba during the coming month, and the authority of the United States is to be withdrawn at that time. Will our purpose have been accomplished or our good faith maintained or our duty performed if we withdraw from the island and leave it to the care of a government bankrupted before it begins? Do we not run the risk in so doing of necessitating another speedy intervention upon our part, and one that will cost us far more than will a trifling concession now in our tariff rates? Is it mere sentiment or is it business sagacity that seeks now to provide against such a contingency?

Is it mere sentiment that seeks to give Cuba a stable and independent government, one that can maintain its duty and its obligations to its own citizens and to foreign countries—the performance of which duty and obligations we have practically underwritten—or is such effort the part of ordinary business caution and prudence, to say nothing of self-protection? Men might fill volumes with talk about this legislation being founded solely upon sentiment, but they could never convince me that I am actuated solely by sentiment in my desire to see Cuba given a government able to maintain and enforce the present sanitation laws of that island so as to protect the people on our Atlantic and Gulf coasts from the invasion of yellow fever, and this is but one of many things highly important to us for the government of Cuba to do and perform.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that when Cuba wrote into her constitution the Platt amendment, and when she granted to us every concession that we asked of her, she became entitled to ask us in return not to leave her upon the same footing, in her commercial dealings with us, that all other countries dealing with us are placed. Good faith to her requires that a different treatment should be accorded her from that accorded to other countries who have made no such concessions to us. Not only does good faith require a different treatment of her, but the protection of our own interests, both in the island and in our own country also, require this different treatment of her to the end that she may maintain a stable and independent government.

The Government of this country, Mr. Chairman, has in operation a high protective tariff system. I am not responsible for the establishment of this system, but the fact that I am not responsible does not blind my eyes to the existence of the system. Cuba knows and feels the effect of it, and our own people know and feel the effects of it. Cuba has no money with which to pay bounties to her sugar producers and has absolutely no way by which she can put herself in position to compete with the bounty sugars of Europe, and if our tariff laws will not let her into our markets except at a loss, her only alternative is to starve.

If there was any other country in the world other than ours to which she could go and form an alliance, offensive and defensive, for the protection of her commerce, we have prevented her from doing so by the conditions we have exacted from her, as I have heretofore demonstrated. Does not every instinct of American justice, therefore, demand that we grant her simple request that she be not treated as strictly a foreign country, but that she be permitted to come just a little way within the circle of the protection that we have set up for our sugar producers against the bounty sugars of Europe?

Gentlemen say, however, that they can not support this bill, because its purpose is not to reduce prices to American consumers. If they mean by this contention to argue that this bill does not purport to reduce the price of sugar 20 per cent to our consumers, while reducing our tariff to Cuba 20 per cent, then their contention is well founded, but their argument is all at fault. If simultaneously with the reduction of the duty to Cuba a similar reduction was had upon the price of sugar in this country, then Cuba would derive no benefit from the reduction and the purpose of the bill would fail entirely.

The bill is designed primarily to relieve Cuba; and if that purpose fails, then the bill must itself fail. Our people, however, are benefited by the concession made in the increased trade that they will enjoy with Cuba, both in exports and imports, the figures concerning which I stated in my former remarks. In this way we will derive as much benefit from the reduction or more than Cuba will derive, and, in addition, we will hope to enjoy the peace and security and protection that will come to us and our interests by a stable and independent government in Cuba.

Other gentlemen say that they can not support this bill because it imposes upon Cuba the requirement that she shall adopt a protective tariff for her people. The only trouble about this argument is that it is unfounded in fact. This bill does not require Cuba to adopt any kind of a tariff different from that which she already has and which is admitted to be a purely revenue tariff, and it must also be admitted that she could substantially increase her present tariff and the same would still be a tariff for revenue only. The bill only requires that Cuba shall make a difference in her tariff rates to us of not less than 20 per cent as against her rates to the most favored country.

If she elects to maintain her present tariff and reduce it 20 per cent to us, she will comply with the conditions of this bill; but if, in lieu of doing this, she prefers to increase her present tariff, still giving us a 20 per cent concession, she will still have complied with the bill. In other words, she is left free and untrammelled to impose whatever kind of a tariff it is her pleasure to impose. I certainly am not in favor of requiring her to adopt a protective system, nor am I in favor of saying to her that she shall not do so. Neither am I in favor of saying to her that her present tariff, one framed by our military government, is too sacred to be touched or changed by her.

I think she should be left free and independent to have just such tariff laws as she desires, and this bill gives her just that kind of freedom and independence. The truth is gentlemen are very much in error who construe this bill to make anything in the nature of a demand upon Cuba so far as her tariff is concerned. The bill really grants to Cuba the prayer that she has made in that regard. It was her own proposition to reduce her tariff rates to us in return for a reduction of our rates to her, and this bill merely gives her the privilege of doing what her representatives and delegates have time and again said they wished the privilege to do. It is the granting of a request and not the making of a demand, and grants a concession that Cuba can accept or reject just as she pleases.

But gentlemen tell us we should not allow Cuba to make any tariff concession to us because there are other trusts than the sugar trust and these other trusts would be benefited thereby. If this be sound logic and good statesmanship, the conclusion is forced upon us that none of our producers, none of our manufacturers, and none of our people can look forward to an extension of their foreign markets or to any concessions for their benefit that our Government may be able to obtain for them in any foreign country, because whatever extension of trade or concession comes to our country it will have to be shared in by all our people, whether in or out of a trust. I am not prepared to deny an advantage to my constituents because some other man's constituents will be benefited thereby, nor am I prepared to refuse relief to Cuba in the only rational way it can be given because in the relief given her a benefit accrues to my people in which other people in whom I am not interested to help will share.

It is also argued, with a zeal to be commended but a judgment to be deplored, that the effect of this bill will be that all the benefit of the reduction made will go to the sugar trust, and at the same time that our sugar producers will be ruined, and if not ruined seriously injured. Both of these contentions can not be true, and one or the other of them must fail as a matter of logic, while both of them will probably fail as a matter of fact. The only possible way for the sugar trust to receive the full benefit of the reduction in this bill will be to have the present price of sugar in this country maintained, and, if the price is maintained, then none of our sugar producers can possibly be affected. It is interesting to note also that if our sugar producers are affected by a reduction in the price of their product, then more than 99 per cent of the American people will be benefited, because more than 99 per cent of them are sugar consumers as against less than 1 per cent of sugar producers.

Gentlemen who are so solicitous that the sugar trust shall receive no benefit from this bill also lose sight of another very important fact; and that is, if it should unfortunately prove true that the benefit in this bill intended for Cuba goes to the trust, the people of this country will nevertheless receive the full benefit of reciprocal trade relations with Cuba, and the people who will be most hurt by this perversion of justice will be the poor Cubans.

As to whether or not the trust will get the benefit of the reduction in this bill appears from all the statements to that effect that have been made to be purely speculative. It is only an opinion that may or may not prove to be well founded. The facts about the matter are that to-day if Cuban sugar is put upon the market in New York it will command the market price, and out of that price the Cuban producer will pay the tariff amounting to 1.685 cents per pound, and what he has left will represent the price that he gets for his sugar, out of which, of course, he has to pay all other charges. If to-morrow the tariff rate is 20 per cent less than it is to-day, it seems to me that the Cuban producer is bound to pay out of the price received by him 20 per cent less for tariff duties, and that the difference in tariff duties paid represents that much saved by him.

If any different result is to follow, it would necessarily require that on the same day, in the same market, for the same sugar, there shall be two separate and distinct prices, which, to my mind, is an absurdity. It is an established fact that Porto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands have received the benefit of the reduction in the tariff made to them; and if they have received it, why not Cuba? So well pleased are the Hawaiian Islands and Porto Rico with what they have received that they are to-day protesting against any tariff concession to Cuba. Judging the future by the past, and that is the only way we can judge it, the argument all seems to be in favor of the Cubans receiving the benefit of the reduction in this bill, if it becomes a law. Certain it is, to my mind, that we can not refuse to-day to make the tender of help to Cuba in the only practical way offered to us through fear of a possibility that that help may not reach her.

As I have previously demonstrated, however, if the trust should devise a way by which it can rob Cuba of the relief contained in this bill, then Congress has the power to correct this great wrong by removing the differential on refined sugar, and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to deprive the trust of any possible power to rob Cuba by removing now this differential on refined sugar.

Gentlemen also talk about this being a bill aimed solely at reducing the tariff on agricultural products, and offering nothing in compensation for the reduction to the agricultural classes. The answer to this suggestion, in brief, is that this bill is not a 20 per cent reduction of the tariff on anything. It is a 20 per cent reduction only on the goods coming from one country, and leaves the tariff on these same goods coming from all other countries exactly as it is to-day.

The reduction that is made is not limited to agricultural products. The bill makes a reduction on everything that Cuba has of 20 per cent, and in return provides that Cuba shall make a 20 per cent reduction on everything that we have. The bill therefore is in no sense limited to agricultural products at either end of the line. The reduction being limited to Cuba, and all that Cuba has to sell not being sufficient to supply our home consumption, it necessarily follows that the prices received by our producers will continue to be fixed by the price of the importations that come from countries other than Cuba and against which the full tariff rates are imposed. It also follows that the reciprocal advantages to come to us by the concession in the Cuban tariff must go to all our people and that no one class or classes will be singled out to be benefited in preference to others.

It was argued for a while that the sugar trust had already bought all of the present crop of Cuban sugar and for this reason that the effect of this bill would be solely in the interest of the sugar trust. Governor-General Wood, however, has furnished information as late as the 7th of this month, which has been read upon the floor, showing that an official inquiry instituted all over the island reveals the fact that only an exceedingly small part of the present crop has been sold to anyone, and he advises, upon the strength of his information, that the Cuban planters will get the full benefit of the reduction made in this bill, so that this argument can no longer be insisted upon.

It has been stated upon this floor that the rate of duty that we impose upon sugar is about the amount of the world's price of sugar, so that our present tariff schedule on sugar compels the American consumer of sugar to pay practically twice the price for his sugar that he would have to pay if this tariff did not exist. In other words, the American consumer of sugar is taxed 100 per cent on the sugar he consumes in order to protect our sugar producers. Notwithstanding this enormous tax that the American people are paying the real purpose of this bill is not to reduce this tax, because its purpose is primarily for the relief of Cuba and not for the relief of the American consumer. The tendency of such reduction, however, is in the interest of the American consumer; and when Cuba's crop increases to sufficient size to supply or approximately supply American consumption, the effect of the reduction, if then in existence, undoubtedly would be to reduce the cost of sugar to the American consumer, and, in my opinion, an occasional reference in this House to the rights of the American consumer, against whom all protective tariffs are laid, ought not to be out of order.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the several arguments against this bill, predicated upon the merits of the bill itself. Other arguments of a purely political nature have also been made prominent in the discussions we have had. I have so far endeavored to discuss the bill from a purely nonpartisan and American standpoint. I have done so because I regard the question involved as concerning the good faith, honor, and fair dealing of the American Government in its relations both with Cuba and its own people, and one that should be considered from an American rather than a party standpoint.

Gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber, however, have asserted—and I assume they considered the assertions necessary to their arguments—that this bill is in strict accord with the Republican doctrine of protection, while other members upon that side, equally able and equally loyal to their party, have asserted in effect that the bill undermines every principle upon which the doctrine of Republican protection is founded. They also charge that this bill marks the opening of what they are pleased to call the red path of tariff reform. Other gentlemen have been led to tell us that the bill is both un-Republican and un-Democratic, and so long as it is defeated they are willing to exculpate both parties from any responsibility for it. These discussions concern me but little, because they throw no light upon the merits of the question and ignore entirely Cuba's need for relief and the duty of this Government to grant it.

In view of what has been said, however, upon both sides of this Chamber, I ask the privilege to refer briefly, as a Democrat, to the political phases of the question before us as they present themselves to me. I know, and regret to know, that among my colleagues on this side there are Democrats, able, just, honest, and loyal to their party, who oppose this bill, some upon one ground and some upon another. I have no admonition, no lecture, no quarrel to offer them. I am content that in this matter they shall be guided by their consciences, as I am guided by mine. Perhaps it would have been better—I think it would have been better—to have eliminated politics from this discussion. They have been brought in, however, and I think it only proper that I should express myself from that standpoint.

I wish to say that reciprocity, a proper reciprocity, one that is established by the Congress, and not merely by the President and Senate, and one that gives freer trade relations between our country and another country, has no terrors for me as a Democrat. It was just such reciprocity that Jefferson declared for, and it was this reciprocity that the Democratic platform of 1892 declared for when it said:

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith.

It is true that this platform condemned, and properly condemned, not reciprocity, but the "sham reciprocity" of the McKinley law. The reciprocity of the McKinley law was in restraint of trade, and not in favor of its enlargement. It was aimed as a retaliatory measure to trade that existed, and not as an invitation to an increased trade. The McKinley law placed sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides on the free list, and the reciprocity feature of the McKinley law only authorized the President to take these articles off the free list if their free introduction was found to be "reciprocally unequal and unreasonable;" and, further, it limited all reciprocal trade relations to countries producing the said agricultural articles so placed on the free list.

The pending bill, however, calls for a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent on everything in both this country and in Cuba, and if this is not a recognition of the principle of true reciprocity I am at a loss to define the word. It is not full reciprocity, but it is a percentage of it and sustains the principle. It is a reduction on everything, with no discrimination of the one thing against the other. It means enlarged trade for our country and less restrictions and greater privileges for our trade.

It seems to me that these things are and have been the aim of the Democratic party, and for my part I can not decline to accept freer trade with one country because I can not get it still freer, and because I can not get it freer with all countries. If ever we are to have freer trade generally there must be a beginning. A beginning is now offered, and as I can not get more I will accept it.

I beg to suggest that if the Democratic party stands for tariff reform, for tariff revision, and for tariff reduction, as I have been taught to believe that it does, that it is not clear to me how the party's position on these great questions will be made plain and manifest to the country if we, as a party, here refuse to vote for this bill, it being the only bill before this body with a single atom of tariff reduction in it for which we can make our votes effective. It is not clear to me how we can sustain ourselves by refusing to accept a slight concession in the tariff upon the ground that we can not obtain a complete concession.

In voting for a slight reduction of the duty on sugar I am not ready to believe that it is undemocratic to vote to reduce the highest schedule in the highest tariff in the history of our country.

When Democrats stood upon this floor two years ago, and I was among the number, and contended against the adoption of the Porto Rican tariff, I did not think that our discussion was purely academic. I thought that results, as well as principles, were involved in that discussion. I thought that the tariff and all of it and any part of it was hurtful to the Porto Ricans, and for that reason, as well as for constitutional reasons, should not be imposed. I believe that the recent imposition of a large percentage of the Dingley tariff rates against the Philippine Islands is both wrong in principle and hurtful in effect upon these islands. A reduction of these rates would be beneficial to them, and so a reduction to Cuba will be beneficial to her, and I believe that the greater the reduction the greater the benefit.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, that those who are responsible for this bill and stand sponsor for it disclaim that it even hints at tariff revision or tariff reform, but are we to determine what the bill is by the name they give it or by an inspection of the bill itself? I dare say that no leader of the Republican party, in the present frame of mind of that party, would call any bill reported by him to this House a tariff-reform measure. Therefore, of necessity, we must look to the terms of any bill reported in order to determine what it is, and an examination of the bill now pending before the House, no matter by what name they call it, shows, by its express terms, that it provides for freer trade relations between the United States and Cuba, and freer trade is the main contention of all tariff-reform advocates. It may well be asked, after such an inspection, how does it happen that a bill reducing tariff schedules and freeing trade comes from the high priests of protection? We are taught to beware of the Greeks bearing gifts, and there are those exceedingly skeptical of any good thing coming out of the Republican Nazareth.

To my mind these suggestions form the most interesting phase of this entire question. If this bill was really a protective measure, if it was intended to still more tightly bind the American consumer with the coils of protection, it is pertinent to ask, Why has the Republican Ways and Means Committee waited four long months before presenting it to the House? The President made the demand upon them for some such legislation the first of last December. The urgency of such legislation, so far as Cuba's good was concerned, existed then. It was pointed out that sugar shipments would be ready in December, and that ordinarily all sugar shipments from Cuba would be over by the 15th of March, and that whatever was done for Cuba's good should be done without delay.

Notwithstanding the urgency of these appeals, and notwithstanding that Cuba's condition was daily growing worse by the piling up of her interest accounts and the stagnation of trade, this bill granting some relief was not brought before the House for consideration until the 8th day of April, more than four months after the House convened. Can any Democrat explain such delay upon the part of the Republicans in reporting a purely Republican measure if this measure answers to that description? If this bill is in strict accord with Republican doctrines, and if it marks no departure from Republican principles of protection, why did the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee lack the courage to report it without first submitting it to the Republican caucus? If it breathes nothing but the doctrine of Republican protection, why was it that the Republican members of this House spent night after night in sweat and turmoil in their caucuses in the effort to find enough votes upon the Republican side of the House to pass it? These actions speak louder than any declamations now can do as to the real effect and meaning of this bill.

It may be asked, however, How is it that the bill is reported at all if it violates any of the principles of Republican protection? One might answer by asking, How is it, if it does not violate these principles, that stalwart protectionists upon the Republican side refuse to support it, and base their refusal upon the ground that it is contrary to the doctrine of protection, and contrary to the pledges of the Republican party, and in strict accord with Democratic profession? The real answer, though, is found in the demand of public sentiment that relief be given to Cuba, a demand founded in so much justice and fairness that the leaders of the Republican party did not dare to openly refuse it. Those of them who are wise and farsighted enough, read the handwriting on the wall, that if the greed and rapacity of the protected classes in this country are allowed to stand in the way of the just and humane performance by this Government of its duty, involving its good faith to Cuba, the result will be the overthrow of high protection and the downfall of Republicanism.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I can not; my time is limited.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I just wanted to ask the gentleman a question, and that is, How can the 20 per cent preferential rate of reduction on Cuban tariff against the United States extend the trade of the United States in the matter of imports into Cuba when we already control the trade, except upon mere sentimental grounds which must be overcome in the future?

Mr. BRANTLEY. If the gentleman had been present at the opening of my remarks he would have had an answer to his question. The Democratic position is, if you have a high tariff wall between you and another country, every degree you make on that tariff wall means a free trade to that extent. It is 20 per cent freedom on all trade coming into this country from Cuba, and it is 20 per cent freedom on all going from this country into Cuba.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. BRANTLEY. I have answered it to the best of my ability.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I want to know in what respect a 20 per cent reduction on the high tariff wall the gentleman refers to is going to increase our trade with Cuba?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for ten minutes more.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, the question of my friend from Louisiana I have answered to the best of my ability. I had passed beyond that question and was proceeding to discuss the political aspects of this question, and have undertaken to show that these Republicans who were farsighted enough to read the handwriting on the wall had discovered that they could not afford to allow the greed and rapacity of the protective classes of this country to stand in the way of the performance of its duty by this Government to the island of Cuba.

This idea was conveyed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in the course of his speech supporting the bill, when he retorted to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who interrupted him, by saying, "You are taking a course that would strike down the industry you are assuming to protect." This is why the Republican leaders have labored so earnestly to procure enough Republican votes to pass this bill. They do not wish the attention of the country called to their humiliating position of being unable to maintain the honor and keep the faith of this Government without the aid of Democratic votes, and all because the protected classes have become so bold as to openly announce that the only interest and the only care of the Republican party shall be to foster, maintain, and fatten them. This bill therefore comes to us, after prolonged delay and discussion in the ranks of the Republican members of the House, not as representing their doctrine, but as an attempt to appease and in part satisfy a public sentiment that can not be trifled with, and it comes with the assurance from Republican leaders to their faithful followers that protection shall be taken care of, notwithstanding the apparent concession made to its enemies by this bill.

That this bill is intended merely as a sop to public sentiment is plainly shown by the long delay in reporting it, by the many caucuses of the Republicans upon it, by the meager concession—meager in amount and meager in the time in which it is to operate—that it makes to Cuba, and by the conditions imposed upon her—conditions that still further affront her sovereignty and call for still further delay before the small concession granted can be made available.

I am persuaded that public sentiment and public justice are not going to be satisfied with this bill, because it goes too far in its demands upon Cuba, and not far enough in its concessions to her, and fails to do the justice and to keep the faith that the people demand of the party in power.

The discussion we are now having reveals a state of affairs in the majority party never before witnessed by me during the five years that I have been here. I have never before witnessed a real division in the ranks of the majority, and little did I expect to see a division come over the matter of protection, a matter so sacred to the Republican heart. This division shows that the leaven of tariff reform is at work, and the friends of this great reform must draw some courage and hope from this division among their long-time antagonists.

The Republican leaders, through stress of circumstances uncontrollable by them, have made an advance toward the Democratic position—not much of an advance, it is true, only 20 per cent on one road, but nevertheless an advance. Because of this advance shall we abandon our position? What becomes of our vaunted faith and courage in our position if we are to be driven from it in order that Republicans may seize and occupy it? Is it not better for us to hold our ground and herald to the country this concession to the principles we maintain, and to fight for still greater concessions to come? Tariff reform can not be intrusted to its enemies or left in the keeping of those who have made reform a necessity; and every victory that tariff reform wins in the public mind or in this forum must redound to the good of the Democratic party. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill occupies an anomalous position before this committee.

It is not supported sincerely by a majority on either the Republican or Democratic side of this House. It comes before the House reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, the majority of which strongly oppose any other measure of tariff modification.

This bill is also supported by a free-trade Democratic element, which will vote for any modification of any tariff schedule, on the theory that it is one step toward their paradise of free trade. The bill is opposed by two elements of the Republicans; by one, which on principle opposes any changes whatever in our present tariff schedules; by another element which desires modification in our tariff schedules affecting such items as iron and steel, glassware, wood pulp, etc., and resists the passage of this bill, that such modifications may be the earlier made.

This bill is also opposed by some Democrats who favor a limited protection and by others who believe in free trade with no intermediate steps.

ARGUMENTS FOR PASSAGE OF BILL.

It is urged that this bill is an Administration measure, and that it is our duty to pass it for three reasons: First, that we owe an obligation to Cuba, our ward, to start the island upon its career as an independent nation—prosperous and able to properly perform its governmental functions—and that because the present price of sugar, the main crop of Cuba, is so low in the markets of the world that Cuban merchants and planters are threatened with bankruptcy, and hence distress, disaster, and possibly revolution may befall its new government.

Secondly, it is urged because the adoption of the so-called Platt amendment by the Cuban convention implied or promised an obligation on the part of our Government to grant preferential trade privileges.

Third, it is urged that the reciprocity proposed by this bill would be of mutual benefit to Cuba and to the United States.

Thus it will be seen that this bill is proposed by two classes of our people—by those who conceive from a sentimental or charitable view we owe an obligation to Cuba and by those who believe it would be good business policy for our country to enter into the trade relations provided in this bill.

OBLIGATIONS OF CUBA TO THE UNITED STATES.

It is important at the outset to examine the relations between Cuba and the United States and to ascertain the true condition of the island and its people.

It is admitted that the United States made war upon Spain mainly because of Cuba; that for Cuba several thousand of our brave boys yielded their lives; that our people expended more than four hundred millions of our treasure, and will carry on the pension rolls of our nation the names of many thousands of our heroes, who for years in the future will receive millions from our Treasury as a partial compensation for their sacrifices on behalf of Cuba.

From our own funds we paid $3,000,000 to the insurgent army and at the close of the war donated 6,000,000 of rations to her starving people.

We cleaned her cities from the accumulated filth of centuries, banished the scourge of yellow fever from her ports, and made the pest holes of the West Indies the sites of a flourishing commerce and of a happy, healthy people. We have builded magnificent roads across the island, employing their people, improving their property, and developing their resources.

We have established more than 3,000 schools, where the bright youth of the island can lay the foundation for the future of that country and acquire that learning and experience of American methods and patriotism that will insure some day a splendid prosperity.

We have given their people the benefit and example of one of the most just and efficient civil governments in all history, a model to all the nations, and an example indeed to many of the municipalities in our own country. Within the Dingley bill was a provision for a discriminating and countervailing duty in our markets against the bounty-fed sugars of Europe, to the extent of such bounty thereby preventing such sugars overwhelming our country, and retaining the best market in the world for the benefit of the Cuban planters. For the past four years the sugar industry in Cuba has been kept alive by this discrimination in their favor, though by it our exports have incurred the hostility of the sugar-producing nations of Europe, and undoubtedly a loss of some millions in our export trade has been caused by this preference to Cuban sugar and this devotion to the Cuban people.

We establish this Cuban government with a revenue system properly administered, and send it forth as an independent government, free from all national indebtedness. No nation on earth ever entered upon its career with so many blessings in its hand granted by the bounty of its generous benefactor.

For all these we have received and asked and been offered no recompense.

If any further obligation from our Government or our people can be conceived, we should know whether it is due to the Cuban people as classes or individuals or to the Cuban government as a separate entity.

OBLIGATIONS TO CUBAN PEOPLE.

Whatever obligations we may be under to Cuba, whatever obligations we are under to its people, it is important for us to consider carefully what these various obligations are, to what people or classes of people we owe a duty, and if we owe a duty, what we should do to adequately fulfill it.

I wish to discuss briefly what classes of the Cuban people have been presented to whom it is claimed an obligation from this Government is due. First, it is necessary always to consider that class which can never help themselves, which is always dependent upon any government for protection, and whose prosperity is always the foundation of real prosperity of the nation, and that is the laboring class of the community. The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, the statements in the press, the observations of those who are acquainted with the conditions of the island of Cuba, all inform us that not only has there been no distress among the laboring classes of Cuba up to this time, but in the future there promises to be no great distress requiring such extreme action as this bill proposes. Work has been more than plentiful during the past year. In public work there is being constructed a railroad nearly 700 miles, the length of the island, and lateral branches to the north and south shores. Much public work in building roads, sewers, and the like is going on at Habana and Santiago.

The crop of sugar for the year has been harvested, or will be by the 1st of May. The crop of next year is practically planted and must be cared for. The same plants which have raised the present crop of Cuban sugar will raise the crop for next year and must be cared for on the large plantations. Any plantings this year will produce a crop for seven and in many cases ten years following, and the large plantations will not be allowed to run to waste when work now will produce a profit for more than two-thirds of that period. During the past year there has been a deficiency of labor. At one part of the island along the railroad line the contractors were obliged to discharge their men, over 3,000 in number, in order that these men might be utilized in securing and harvesting the crop of sugar. That condition will continue during the next year, so there is no real danger of any distress among the laboring classes of the island, and they do not need the relief afforded by this or any other bill. What they need is what all classes always need—a good, just, wise, and strong administration that shall inspire confidence in the development of the magnificent resources of that lovely island.

OBLIGATIONS TO PLANTERS.

It is next important to consider the class which has principally clamored for relief, and that is the large planters of the island. Many of this class have appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, and their testimony appears in the printed hearings. Their statements have been published in the public press, and that testimony shows that nearly all of them are not residents in Cuba. They are not citizens of that little nation and do not expect to be. They live on the continent of Europe, in Paris, in Madrid, in London, and some of them live in this country and have their splendid homes and offices in New York or in Boston.

This one thing is evident. Those men have no particular love for Cuba; they are looking after their own business. They come here to protect that business. They care nothing in general about the public conditions in Cuba. It is this class of men who ask relief from Congress. They have gone to Cuba from foreign nations, have invested thousands and hundreds of thousands in a business speculation, and when there seems a prospect of a temporary loss of profits they ask a guaranty of their investments from this Congress.

These men took no part in the revolution that is to make Cuba independent. They took no great part in the proceedings that will establish the independent government of Cuba. They will take no particular part in the conduct of its affairs. Yet they have the effrontery to come to this Congress and ask that we change our fiscal policy in order to help their business. They have gone into that business just the same as every man in this country has gone into his business. Many of them have made money in the island of Cuba in the past; they will make money in the future. But because there happens to be a temporary loss in their revenues—because this year by reason of conditions beyond the control of Congress, beyond the control of this country, there is a depression and possible loss in their business—they ask us to make good that deficiency.

WORLD'S SUGAR PRODUCTION.

There is a large surplus of sugar in the world's markets to-day, far more than can be soon consumed.

The world can use about 10,000,000 tons of sugar each year. The best estimate of the world's production for the current year 1902 is taken from the recent Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance for January, 1902, page 2759, as follows:
